Reagan's neighbors: no privacy

United Press International
LOS ANGELES—One of Ronald Reagan's neighbors knew things would be different when she strolled out early one morning in her robe to get her morning paper.

As she looked up, a television camera was aimed at her, recording her daily routine.

"There's just no privacy left all of a sudden," said Sabrina Schiller. "We have to brush our hair to get the newspaper."

Schiller's experience is one of the dozens of ways Reagan's election has changed daily life in the affluent Pacific Palisades neighborhood where the president-elect lives.

Telephone company crews have jury-rigged cables in trees and gutters to handle the extra lines for Reagan and reporters. Secret Service agents check incoming traffic. Curious tourists drive on narrow hillside streets for a glimpse of who-knows-what.

The Secret Service has leased a house, which had been for sale for more than $1 million, next to Reagan's at his agents.

Not all is elegance. Last week, the plumbing succumbed in the agents' house under the strain of the extra inhabitants. The guards used temporary outhouses.

The president-elect's staff has leased a sprawling modern house across the street for an office.

Neighbors have rented extra housing space and even driveways to television networks. United Press International and The Associated Press are renting trees to hold up their telephones and CBS rented phone space on a fence.

ABC is paying $2,000 a month for a bathroom-equipped maid's quarters above a nearby garage.

Having a big shot in the neighborhood isn't new, however. Lawrence Welk, Bill Cosby and Sylvester Stallone all live nearby. Schiller's husband, Bob, is an Emmy-winning comedy writer.

He said that after the election he was tempted to put a sign on his garage reading, "Last Democrat Before Reagan."

Elsa Myers, wife of the senior vice president of 20th Century Fox, noted the extra security failed to deter burglars, who in August cleaned out a neighbor's house — with the Secret Service standing right over there.

Retired animals live quiet

United Press International
SEQUIM, Wash.—Some of the Hollywood's wildest stars live quietly in a remote 87-acre former dairy farm. Bozo the grizzly bear, Silver the lynx and their fellow animal pals haven't let stardom go to their heads. They live practically unnoticed to the refuge on the rainy Olympic Peninsula.

In real life a 15-year-old grizzly, Bozo played a male bear in the "Grizzly Adams" television series. Silver, a steely-eyed actor, uses his leaping ability to his advantage in television commercials for Mercury's new line of Lynx.

About 300 animals reside at the Olympic Game Farm, including Siberian tigers, timber wolves and about three dozen other species. Most have appeared on action movies, TV shows and commercials.

All of the creatures are owned and trained by Lloyd Beebe, 64, a logger and dairyman who put his love for animals and a keen film-making into a unique career.

For more than 25 years, Beebe worked as one of the premier photographers for Walt Disney Studios, where he made more than 100 films.

Many of the films were Disney's popular "True Life Adventure" series, and most were photographed at least in part on the farm.

Beebe's credits as a photographer include such films as "White Prairie," "White Wilderness," "Those Callows," "White Dog" and "Nikki, Wild Dog of the North." The trainer keeps many of his best friends at the farm but the attraction is Bozo.

Out of work for a couple of years since her series ended, Beebe lounges around her enclosure, her bits of stage business — sitting at a picnic table, holding paws and bowing her head at the time — for the visitors who come through seven days a week.

While Bozo awaits another call, Silver has become a hot face.

The lynx was paid $18,000 for the top of a huge globe for Mercury commercials.

Beebe said the lithe cat cost every penny by spending six weeks in Hollywood and North Dakota while the three spots were being not to mention three weeks at the farm. He was induced to the jump by a pan of steak.
