and won't drive back, he said. Malls create a feeling of closeness, and Lester said, "J.Q. Public is lazy and doesn't want to walk. If they can't park right in front downtown, customers won't park a block away."

Lester's original store was on Main Street, but a fire destroyed it in 1976 and it was never rebuilt.

"It's not feasible to rebuild," Lester said. "The problem with downtown Bryan is that it's all right for a small store with a small volume."

"It's all right for a mom and pop business because the rent is cheap," he added.

Kenny Martin's jewelry store falls into this mom and pop category. He opened a small store in uptown Bryan in 1978 and will soon move into his own larger store in the heart of Main Street.

"Business has been good," he said. Like Dodson, Martin said he relies on loyal customers making repeat purchases and telling their friends.

He didn't open in a mall for economic reasons. In a mall, Martin explained, the rent is high and includes a percentage of the gross.

"That's gross," he stressed, "not profit."

Montemayor agrees with Martin. "Everyone keeps shuffling off to the malls and in my opinion they're not doing as well," he said.

Montemayor opened his downtown restaurant in September and said he's doing great.

"The area is better than ever," he said. "People see one or two buildings empty and that's what catches the eye. It's very much alive."

Both businessmen were attracted to the area in part by one of downtown's chief charms — low overhead.

But he hesitates in calling this a trend. There are still too many vacancies, he said, which hurts the area.

"They tend to bring down property values," Miller said. "Buildings deteriorate more rapidly when they're just sitting there."

This is due to the lack of maintenance and vandalism, he explained. The resulting run down appearance tends to discourage investors, Miller added.

"Buying a vacant building is the difference between buying an occupied house and an empty one," he said. "It's hard to imagine what it'll look like when it's not fixed up."

But it's anyone's guess if downtown Bryan will ever be fixed up. Neither the city of Bryan or the downtown merchants are involved in any revitalization project. But the land and space is available for those who are interested in becoming a part of this aging but often attractive area.
