Strong sentiments along Texas backroads

Travelers through Reagan, north of Marlin, see this advertisement for Texas A&M University, and they have no doubt where this farmer's loyalties lie. T.L. Kilpatrick, Class of '54, hopes the sign and picture on his barn will encourage viewers to attend Texas A&M.

Candidates must comply with election regulation

By CAROLYN BARNES
Battalion Reporter

Signs of spring and spring elections are everywhere. Candidates for student government offices have started campaigning by setting up billboards and distributing fliers.

Leah Whitby, election commissioner, said that there are regulations candidates must follow.

To be eligible to campaign, students had to attend one of two mandatory meetings held Sunday and Monday night, to review election regulations and to draw for placement on the election ballot.

Whitby said Student Government election regulations are the same as rules governing other student organizations.

Wooden signs are limited to a total of 32 square feet.

Fliers can be a maximum of 8 1/2-by-11 inches, usually noon to 9 p.m., if distributed by a member of the opposite sex. Whitby said. Fliers can also be posted on bulletin boards, she said.

Candidates cannot campaign at student meetings or at student government offices.

She said candidates can do just about anything they want, as long as they don't stop class.

On voting day, Wednesday, candidates must have at least 100 feet from the voting polls, she said.

Punishment for any violations of the regulations is "up to the discretion of the election commission," Whitby said. "It depends on the severity of the violation."

Room fees could be paid twice

By KATHLEEN WIATREK
Battalion Reporter

If one person moves out of a dorm after a certain date and another person moves into that room, Texas A&M University could get paid twice for the room for at least half of the semester.

Dena Todd, coordinator of special services in student affairs, said that this situation is possible and does happen, but it is in accordance with University regulations.
