Higher parking fines fail as deterrents

By BERNIE FETTE
Battalion Staff

Even though fines for traffic and parking violations were doubled in September, there has been no significant decrease in the number of those violations, according to University Police records.

In the fall, fines for parking violations increased from $5 to $10, while fines for moving violations jumped from $10 to $20. The $5 fee for late payments remained the same.

"I can't see any difference at all," Director of Traffic and Security Thomas R. Parsons said. "The increase was meant to act as a deterrent."

University Police used to issue separate tickets for separate violations. Now multiple violations may be cited on the same ticket.

"We don't issue many at all on weekends, for instance, and on Friday we issue very few because due to people's scheduling habits they go home early on Friday," he explained.

Monday, he said, is a heavy ticket day since it is a heavy class day.

Fines vary from month to month also, he said. "December is a light month because almost nobody's here and March is a heavy month because that's when we send out delinquent fine reports."

The increase failed in its main purpose, Parsons said. And there are no plans next year for a still higher increase to deter violators.

What may be a deterrent to some people may not be to others, he said.

"Just because $10 is a lot to you may not mean it's that much to me," he said.

From Sept. 1 to March 31, University Police collected $303,353 in traffic fines, an increase of 29 percent over last year's total of $213,850 during the same period.

Fewer tickets have been written this year; however, the reason for the lower number is not fewer violations, Parsons said.

University Police used to issue separate tickets for separate violations. Now multiple violations may be cited on the same ticket.

There is no clear-cut monthly or daily average number of tickets issued or income from those tickets, Parsons said. The number varies depending on class schedules and University Police schedules.
