Formal investigation of blast begins today

United Press International
GLENWOOD SPRINGS, Colo. — Mourning families have begun burying the bodies of 15 men killed in an explosion at the bottom of one of the nation's deepest coal mines.

Autopsies were completed Sunday and the bodies released to the families. Meanwhile, the government's formal investigation into the cause of the blast, which rocked the Dutch Creek No. 1 mine at Redstone, began today.

An Easter memorial service in a high-school gym drew more than 1,500 of the victims' friends and relatives. Most of the floor seating was taken up by 250 family members, who wept softly or listened solemnly to the prayers and eulogies.

"Easter will always remind you of this tragedy," the Rev. Gail Jones, pastor of the local Baptist Church, told the mourners. "We realize that there are few lives in a town of this size that have not been touched by this tragedy."

John Cooke, spokesman for the mortuary, said it would be "some time" before the results of the autopsies would be made public.

"There is still quite a bit of laboratory work to be done," Cooke said. "They test every possible organ — heart, lungs, liver — everything. It takes some time. Fifteen men, 15 dissected bodies."

John Barton, spokesman for the U.S. Mine Safety and Health Administration, said the men apparently were killed instantly by the explosion. He added, however, that the official determination of the cause of death would not be made public until after inquest.

The bodies were found Friday, 7,200 feet down the sloping shaft that follows the coal-bearing Williams Fork Formation.

"I'm hoping the union will rank with the company in attempts to get through a difficult time," said Mid-Continent President John Reeves. "If we do our utmost, we will pull through, if we don't do our very best, we could be in trouble."

The April issue of the company's in-house publication, the last 15 months had been the worst financially since 1956.

"If the ratio between production costs does not improve, answer looms as a large possibility — that is to shut the mines down," the company said.

Dutch Creek No. 1 is one of the Mid-Continent mines carved into the west slopes of the upper Crystal River Valley. The mine produces high-quality coal which is processed into coke for use in blast furnaces.

A company brochure said mines produce coal from deposits that were "nearly inaccessible" requiring mines "among the deepest coal operations in the United States, with cover that occasionally exceeds 2,500 feet."

Bargaining talks between the company and the local independent union were set to begin Wednesday, the day of the explosion. The existing contract expires May 13, but no date has been set for resumption of bargaining.

Before the blast, Mid-Continent had been urging union leaders to endorse an unapproved production schedule calling for a seven-day-a-week production schedule.
