100,000 are suffering from Love Field noise

United Press International
DALLAS — Some 100,000 residents living near the controversial Love Field airport suffer from noise pollution which exceeds levels people can tolerate without interference with normal activities, a city-financed study revealed.

The residents live in nine neighborhoods around the airport which is used mostly by Southwest Airlines and the newly founded Muse Air.

The study, made in May and released Friday, said noise at the airport was sufficient to provoke "widespread complaints" and "individual threats of legal action."

The residents are subjected to around-the-clock sound levels of 70 decibels — or 15 decibels more than the ideal maximum noise level set by the Environmental Protection Agency for residential neighborhoods, the study said.

Lori Palmer, co-chairman of the Love Field Citizens Action Committee, said the study confirmed that the "extent and seriousness of the noise exposure is of a magnitude that the city must now establish an effective noise control program." The group wants the city council to impose a curfew on night flights.

The EPA admits few urban neighborhoods enjoy the maximum 55 decibel noise level and the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development has set 65 decibels as the level above which it will not subsidize new housing without the use of special noise muffling techniques.

According to the EPA, noise of 60 decibels will provoke only sporadic complaints but when levels reach 70 decibels, community reaction would intensify with strong appeals to public officials.

The study was ordered by city officials last spring. Nearby residents have been complaining to authorities to reduce the noise level.

City officials warned the study was only a preliminary step and that the consultants would submit their recommendations in November.

Southwest Airlines has released its own consultant report saying the area affected by noise levels of 65 decibels or more had been reduced since 1973 and would decrease after the airline introduces quieter jets.

Haitians remain in jail, request for asylum denied

United Press International
NEW ORLEANS — Federal attorneys say 25 Haitians imprisoned for six weeks will have to remain in jail a while longer because their request for political asylum was rejected.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Ronald Fonseca filed his opposition Friday to a request by the 25 to get out of the Orleans Parish Community Correctional Center. Fonseca claimed the Haitians were in the United States illegally.

Edwin Chauvin of the Immigration and Naturalization Service refused to confirm or deny that the asylum plea had been rejected.

"The U.S. attorney has instructed me not to discuss the case while it is pending in court," Chauvin said.

The Haitians' attorney, James Gray III, said denial of asylum did not affect his efforts to get them out of jail.

"I had assumed they would deny it," he said. "I don't think it changes the basis of the habeas corpus suit. There's a long process involved. The basic question is whether it's in their best interest to let them go, whether it's in the best interest of the government to hold them."

Fonseca said the State Department earlier this week recommended the Haitians' request for political asylum be rejected. He said INS officials were in the process of notifying the 25 of the ruling.

If the local immigration service complies with the State Department's recommendation, the Haitians will be brought before an INS judge Sept. 14, according to court documents.

U.S. Magistrate Marcel Livaudais completed his report on the motion filed by Gray to get the Haitians out of jail and sent it on to U.S. District Judge Morey L. Sear for review.

Fonseca said the government was "moving with all deliberate speed."

"In addition to requests of other aliens, presently there are approximately 2,000 Haitians who are being detained by the United States awaiting exclusion hearings or deportation," Fonseca said.

The 19 men and six women were picked up July 16, 150 miles south of the mouth of the Mississippi River. Immigration officials ordered the oil company to take custody of the refugees when the ship docked in Chalmette, La.

Federal authorities took over custody July 24, and one day later the Haitians were transferred to the correctional center.

Vegas trips, Texas firm under fire

United Press International
CONCORD, N.H. — A Texas-based firm offering 3-day vacations to Las Vegas has come under the scrutiny of the New Hampshire attorney general's office.

Attorney General Gregory Smith said Friday the firm Passport to Pleasure has been promoting the trip, which includes hotel accommodations, meals and a gambling package reportedly worth $500.

Smith said some people have reportedly given the firm their credit card numbers over the phone, but then declined to buy the trip. Later, he said, they have been billed for the trip.

He said there are also questions about the quality of the hotel and the meals offered and the availability of sufficient hotel space.

Smith said the gambling package is also routinely offered by the Las Vegas Chamber of Commerce for less than $5.

The firm is currently being investigated by the Texas attorney general's office due to a large number of complaints about its business practices, Smith said.
