past 10 years, but leveled off during the past two years, says a fishing industry executive.

Even so, consumers are not eating much more fish per capita than they used to, Lee Weddig said at a recent news conference.

Weddig is executive vice president of the Washington National Fisheries Institute, Inc., a trade association. He spoke at a two-day meeting of food reporters and editors who were guests of the institute at this Long Island fishing port.

"I think people are eating less food over all," Weddig said. "Protein consumption is down or stabilized because of the economy."

Understandably, many varieties of fresh fish now cost as much or more per pound than that all-American favorite, beef.

"More grocery stores, especially in the Midwest, are carrying fresh fish and more restaurants are putting fish on their menus. Fish and seafood account for as much as two-thirds of some restaurant menus."

Until recently, Weddig said, federal regulations forbade mixing ground fish with ground meat. But technology now exists for putting up to 15 percent fish flesh in a frank without changing the taste, he said. The result: a frankfurter type product with lower fat and higher protein content than the all-meat variety.

He said Africans are being encouraged to farm raise tilapia because they grow fast and eat things like carrot tops — unlike other farm-raised varieties such as catfish and trout that have to be fed animal protein such as fish meal.

Of high prices, Weddig said: "They rise only as much as people are willing to pay."

Retail prices are also affected by restaurateurs and the weather, he said.

"Processors have a daily demand they feel they must fill. If a good restaurant wants to have, say, Boston scrod on its menu every day, the processor feels he must fill that order. When the catch is short and the weather is poor, it sends prices up."

A commercial fisherman who loses a day's work because of rough weather is worse off than a farmer, Weddig said. The farmer's crops are usually still there when weather improves, but schools of fish will have moved on.

As prices have risen for familiar varieties such as cod and salmon, the vacuum has been filled by things like hake, tilefish, Alaskan pollock, croaker and grey mullet — what fishermen used to call trash fish and throw back when there was enough to eat.

"But fish like mullet are going to make it into smaller communities because fishermen bring in enough to make it while," Weddig said.

Hake and pollock, however, caught in great quantities, much used in the United States, he said.

Unfamiliarity may be the reason, said Diane C. Boraty, National Marine Fisheries Service, a federal agency.

She said the questions consumers most often ask about fish is "What is it?"

"How can I prepare it?" "What's a good substitute?" "What's a good substitute?" "The market is out of the way, what do you want?"

The NFI is preparing a chart to help answer all three questions. The chart will rate several varieties of fish by their characteristics: color, taste, flakiness or firmness, texture and fat content. If the fish is out of, or the price is too high, for, say, cod, the chart will list other varieties that are similar and can be cooked like cod.

New cancer experiment passes preliminary tests

United Press International — NEW YORK — The magic number is 18 when Dr. Alvin J. Glasky talks about a drug designed to help the body fight cancer that has spread beyond the point where it first struck.

He said use of the experimental drug in 18 patients in 18 medical centers in Europe for 18 months shows promise, but requires considerable more testing before it can be considered an anti-cancer weapon.

Glasky, president and director of research for Newport Pharmaceuticals International Inc., said several hundred cancer patients will be added to the test population in Europe in the next two months — the second phase of a plan for massive trials overseas.

A report on the drug, co-authored by scientists from Newport and the Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center in New York, was presented at the annual meeting of the American Chemical Society.

Glasky said the drug peps up the immune system — nature's frontline in the battle against bad viruses, bacteria and other foreign objects, including cancer cells.

Glasky said cancer cells, unlike regular ones, are treated like foreign objects when the immune system senses their presence. The theory that led to the development of the experimental drug, said Glasky, is that cancer turns off the immune system.

Glasky said the immune system turns out antibodies — chemical soldiers that fight bad viruses and such. But these take a month to develop, he said.

However, there is also cell-mediated immunity. It helps people recover rapidly from the other things even before antibodies can develop, Glasky said.

"The cell immune system is most important in rapid response from viral and bacterial infections and in suppressing cancer," he said.

"We've been working on a theory that we need something to raise cell-mediated immunity."

White blood cells are the body that will kill any foreign. But suppression of these cells depresses immunity. Glasky said it appears that cancer presses these natural killers out.

According to evidence from preliminary trials in Europe, a new drug which goes by the name of NPT15392, or "383," short, beefs up the cell-mediated immunity.

Glasky said the man-made is a purine derivative. Purine part of nucleic acids, comprises that play a central role in the body's hereditary process.

"We think it will be commercially available in Europe within two to three years," Glasky said.

The cancer patients getting the drug are treated at medical centers in Belgium, France, Germany, Switzerland and Austria under sponsorship of the governments and cancer research units.

Glasky said Mitsubishi Chemical Industries is a partner in research with and development of the drug in Japan.
