Heads of Atlanta organization charged with misuse of funds

United Press International
ATLANTA — A Georgia consumer official says the leaders of a charity formed to support the families of the 28 young blacks murdered in Atlanta "made a mockery of the law" — even using committee funds to pay for a woman's tummy-tuck operation. Camille Bell, head of the Committee to Stop Children's Murders and mother of one of the murdered children, said Monday her group made some fund-raising mistakes "out of ignorance" but did not intentionally violate the law.

Tim Ryles, administrator of the state's Office of Consumer Affairs, said he will seek a court order to force the group out of business and recommended local prosecutors file criminal action against the officers.

Ryles questioned the use of more than $500 of STOP committee funds to pay for a tummy tuck operation for Venus Taylor, one of the officers and mother of a victim.

Bell said STOP gave the money to Taylor as partial payment for a $2,000 loan Taylor had given to the organization.

"Since it was Venus' money, it was not our business how she spent it," Bell said.

The audit, was to be conducted by a certified public accountant by Oct. 16, but Ryles says he hasn't seen an audit.

Officers of the committee released a statement Monday saying they had insufficient funds to pay for the audit but offered to turn their records over to Ryles.

Bell said: "We just have no money. As a matter of fact, the organization itself is in debt."

Ryles said the earlier violations included failing to register as a charity, failure to file quarterly reports and false sponsor claims. The committee finally registered and filed quarterly reports after threats from Ryles.

He also questioned whether the group had adhered to a state law requiring charities to use at least 70 percent of all funds toward the purpose stated when the money was raised.
