U.S. farmers support higher target pricing

survey of farmers' attitudes that shows support for higher target prices may be aid members of Congress preparing for a House-Senate conference on the pending four-vear farm bill

Conferees will be faced with choices between a Senate bill with specific monetary limits on support levels and a more expensive House bill which would raise grain supports according to increases in farmers' costs.

A major battle will be the level of target prices.

With a threat of a presidential veto as a trump card, the Reagan administration will be pushing for the Senate version of the farm bill. The new Cotton Inc. survey was based on telephone interviews with a national sample of 461 cotton farmers and 100 farmers of other crops. The survey found responses of cotton and non-cotton farmers were similar.

Sixty-seven percent of farmers said they preferred higher target prices, which provide farmers with direct cash if market prices fall below targets. Higher price support loan levels, which serve as price floors under crops, were preferred by 57 percent of far-The largest percentage, 78 percent, supported federal disaster that as a vital part of the nation's payments to farmers who lose part of their crops to bad weather. It is out premiums.

The disaster program is being replaced by an expanded crop insurance program that requires farmers to pay premiums, with some federal subsidy. That issue was settled in legislation last year so it will not be an important topic in the conference.

Only 32 percent of farmers in the survey supported acreage con-

The survey concluded that clear majorities of farmers believe the government should provide a buffer against poor harvests and overabundant harvests.

The survey found some contradictions because farmers appear to oppose government involvement in agriculture. Fifty-five percent said farmers are more independent of governbenefits than people many other walks of life but 39 percent disagreed.

A majority of farmers, 59 percent, said government should if given a free choice, compare stay out of agriculture." The surwith only 60 percent of the general stay out of agriculture. vey attempted to explain the conflicting viewpoints of farmers with regard to the government.

It said while "farmers as an occupational group place great importance on the values of independence and self-reliance, they, at the same time, tend to believe economy they have a certain entitlement to government assist-
