Daren Davis, left, and Dr. Jon Botsford, center, pour molten bronze into a cannon mold while Daryl Worsham looks on. The bronze has been heated to 2000 degrees, which could be the reason Daryl is standing back. The Foundry, where the pouring took place, is located in the Engineering Technology labs across from Harrington.

Water trust fund criticized

United Press International
AUSTIN — The president of an Mexican-American organization termed the constitutional proposal to establish a special trust fund for future water projects a "Robin Hood plan" in reverse.

"It would rob from the poor and give to the rich," said Richard Moya, president of Mexican-American Democrats. "Skimming off half the state fund surplus every legislative session to create a half billion nest egg for water developers will jeopardize funding for already seriously underfunded programs for the poor, services for dependent children, the deaf and the blind."

Moya said the only people the plan will benefit are West Texas farmers with big irrigation projects. Forrest Burt, president of the Texas Association of College Teachers, said anyone concerned with higher education in Texas should oppose the water plan.

"The crucial issue is the desirability of tying up unknown sums of money for specific purposes and leaving less leeway to meet unforeseen state needs," Burt said. He noted surplus funds were used in 1975 and 1981 to fund emergency pay raises for state employees and college faculty members, and said those funds might not be available in the future if the water plan is approved.

Austin Mayor Carole McClellan, chairman of a committee promoting passage of the water plan, criticized demonstrators who campaigned against the amendment outside the Capitol.

"While they certainly are entitled to their opinions, those who seek to deny Texas a sound financing plan to meet our growing water problems simply do not represent the opinion of most informed leaders," McClellan said. "I suspect some people would be against indoor plumbing if it were on the ballot."
