Former defense official: medical services unready

United Press International
SAN ANTONIO — All the money being allocated for national defense to purchase jets, bombers, missiles and submarines will be wasted in the event of war unless some money is spent for medical support services to help heal the wounded combatants, a former U.S. assistant defense secretary says.

Dr. John H. Moxley III, who served as assistant defense secretary for health affairs under former President Jimmy Carter, said 90 percent of the wounded fighters could not be adequately treated in a war unless $1.7 billion is devoted over the next five years to building up the strength of the military medical services.

"The harsh reality is that if the United States committed its forces to major combat today — whether in the Far East, Southwest Asia or Europe — we could not care for a significant portion of our casualties," he said.

Moxley outlined what he called glaring weaknesses in the United States' system of wartime medical support to physicians attending the annual meeting of the Association of Military Surgeons of the United States.

"In the face of an enemy challenge," Moxley said, "we would have either to forego defense of our national interests or commit our servicemen to combat without the medical support we have been able and willing to provide in every war in American history."

"If we do commit our forces without sufficient medical support, the wounded who would be denied surgery by our lack of operating rooms would die in large numbers."

Stabilized OPEC prices just sand in wind, analysts say

United Press International
DALLAS — A group of private energy analysts expect gasoline prices to rise 2 to 3 cents a gallon in the next year — despite OPEC's recent stabilization of oil prices.

"In the very near-term it's hard to say whether the increases would go beyond 2 or 3 cents a gallon," said Sam Bright, senior energy analyst for Rauscher, Pierce, Refsnes Inc.

The Dallas investment banking and brokerage firm sponsored another of its regular news briefings on OPEC activities Monday.

"You would expect to see some firming (in the gas prices)," Bright said.

The analysts said last week's successful move by Saudi Arabia to standardize the price of oil at $34 a barrel for the 15 OPEC nations strengthens the Arab country's status as an important U.S. ally. The agreement was reached at an OPEC conference in Geneva, Switzerland.

"Saudi Arabia just got the OPEC nations together and said, 'We can't keep on charging gouged oil prices; we've got to make a business out of it,'" Howard Bonham, senior analyst for the firm, said.

Saudi Arabia had threatened to increase oil production if the other OPEC nations — which had been charging up to $41 a barrel — failed to standardize their prices. Bonham said because Saudi Arabia is the only OPEC nation with enough reserves to last through the year 2000, it is more interested in long-term petroleum markets. The country doesn't want to be left with enormous oil reserves if high oil prices force nations like the United States to develop other energy sources, Bonham said.

"The recent meeting marked a point at which OPEC has had to step back and take a look at their pricing policy," Bonham said.

The analysts predict OPEC's share of world oil production will continue to decline and non-OPEC oil-producing nations like Mexico, the United Kingdom and Norway will increase their share of world oil markets.

"OPEC's share of the world market is slipping and will continue to slip," Bonham said. OPEC's annual rate of decline will be about 1.3 percent, he said. "Some of these non-OPEC countries have been increasing production dramatically," Bright said.

Bonham said the stability of OPEC prices will not discourage domestic oil production in the United States. He said any price beyond $22 dollars a barrel is sufficient to stimulate domestic oil production.

Bonham said oil prices would have to be much higher to encourage the more expensive off-shore oil production. Bonham said Saudi Arabia's power to affect oil prices may have influenced senators and representatives last week to approve the sale of AWACS aircraft to the country, but said he does not believe Saudi Arabia intends to use oil as a political weapon.
