Liability law called silly by attorney

United Press International
AUSTIN — A representative of several Texas insurance companies has told a legislative panel that a new law requiring motorists to demonstrate to police officers that they carry liability insurance is unworkable.

Under legislation passed during the last session, Texas motorists will be required to carry minimum liability insurance as of Jan. 1 and show evidence of that coverage to law enforcement officers when stopped.

Dallas attorney Richard Geiger, who represents a group of fire and casualty insurance companies, said a motorist could show an officer a policy that had been canceled by the company.

"The only absolute proof would be in hindsight," Geiger said. "The best thing you could do would be to repeal this silly law."

Shuttle's next name could be 'repairman'

United Press International
HOUSTON — Space-agency planners have set the space shuttle's eleventh mission, which is scheduled for 1983, as the first test of a space craft's ability to repair satellites in space.

Officials at the National Aeronautics and Space Administration are hoping that a solar observatory known as the Solar Maximum Mission will be the first satellite fixed in orbit by a space shuttle crew. The Solar Maximum blew three times seven months after its February 1980 launch.

Scientists said a control unit malfunction blew the fuses, leaving the satellite unable to record solar activity because it could not accurately focus on the sun's surface.

The repair operation would call for the shuttle to grab the 20-foot-long, 5,192-pound vehicle, which is 320 miles above the Earth, with its payload bay arm and pull it aboard the shuttle, astronaut Bruce McCandless said Monday.

Although SMM is equipped with a handle for the shuttle's space arm to grab, McCandless said it might be necessary for an astronaut wearing a rocket backpack to fly out and hold the vehicle steady so it can be grabbed.

Once aboard, astronauts could replace the faulty unit and return the satellite to its orbit.

McCandless, who hopes to be aboard the shuttle for the tentative October 1983 mission, said the repair operation would save money, assuming officials consider the satellite's mission important enough to launch another satellite if the original cannot be fixed.

The estimated cost of one shuttle mission in the operational phase is $30 million to $40 million, and that cost can be divided over more than one task during a flight. The SMM cost $155.8 million to build and launch in 1979.

"But I don't think you'll find the payoff is in dollars," McCandless said. "To me, the real payoff is in demonstrating you've got the capability to do this sort of thing."

"Solar Max will be the first time we'll approach a satellite that's been up there for a while with the idea of doing something to it."

Scientists at Goddard Research Center who developed the SMM also hope astronauts will be able to fix three experiments aboard the satellite.

If carried out as planned, the 1983 repairs of the satellite — named solar maximum because it was launched to observe a period of maximum activity by the sun — would come a year earlier than planned.

"The original plan was to return it to Earth sometime around 1984. The hope at Goddard was it could be refitted and used during solar minimal (a time of minimum solar activity in the late 1980s)," McCandless said.
