No party hat, no job, says fired woman

United Press International
HOUSTON — An employment agency placement officer who is Jewish claims her refusal to don an Easter bonnet at a company lunch resulted in her unlawful dismissal.

Marcia Meyer Rodstein has filed a federal lawsuit seeking $25,000 in back pay and reinstatement with M. David Lowe Personnel Services. The company contends her May 1980 dismissal was not related to her religious beliefs.

Rodstein claimed she was invited to the Easter bonnet awards lunch — one month before the firing — because she was a top producer in the company.

Her lawsuit, filed Thursday, said she ignored a supervisor's suggestion to enter competition for most beautiful and most creative bonnets "because she was a member of the Jewish faith and did not believe in Easter."

Lowe disputed Rodstein's claims, saying she was fired after working three years at the employment service because she did not fit in with the company. He said the supervisor who fired her was Jewish, and said several other people at the 1980 lunch did not wear bonnets.

Polite bandit waits his turn

United Press International
OROVILLE, Calif. — Police are looking for a gunman who demanded money from an ice-cream parlor clerk then waited while she served two customers. Officer Russell Bergman said clerk Dena Hill at Baskin-Robbins 31 Flavors reported that the bandit fled with $25.

She said she was alone when he came in late Thursday and demanded "all the money in the register." Then he pulled back and waited, allowing her to serve two men who had come in. After they were served, he grabbed the money and fled.
