Fewer quakes caused fewer deaths in 1981

United Press International
GOLDEN, Colo. — The U.S. Geological Survey says the number of earthquakes worldwide declined last year as compared to 1980, and fewer people died as a result.

The USGS National Earthquake Information Service said Tuesday only two significant earthquakes occurred in the United States last year, compared with 11 in 1980. Earthquakes caused no U.S. deaths in 1981.

Waverly Person, NEIS geophysicist, said the last quake-related death in the United States was on Nov. 29, 1975, when two people died in a tidal wave caused by a 7.2-magnitude earthquake in Hawaii.

Worldwide, there were 50 significant earthquakes

(measuring 6.5 or more on the Richter scale) last year, down from 71 in 1980. The 1981 death toll of 5,239 included 4,500 killed in two separate quakes in Iran on June 11 and July 28.

There were 12 earthquakes throughout the world with magnitudes of 7.0 or more in 1981, far below the average of 19.
