Ft. Worth becomes cattle mecca

United Press International
FORT WORTH — The Texas cattle business, once characterized by weathered animals grazing the open range, is rapidly becoming a high-tech industry in which the modern cattleman is a genetic engineer.

At this year's Southwest Exposition and Fat Stock Show, running through Feb. 7, the cattle being shown are bigger, longer, heavier and meatier than those mangy range herds of ages past.

Today's cattle are locked in feedlots and fed calculated portions of roughage, grain and supplements — including vitamins, protein, hormones and growth stimulants.

This show is an opportunity for professional showmen and women to display the best of their herds. Millions of dollars in stud fees and calf sales will be at stake.

But while the professional displayers regard the show as strictly business, it is also an opportunity for the state's young farmers to show their steers and heifers with potential for a paid college education. In most cases the animals are actually half-ton pets that have been fed, groomed and played with.

But 75 percent of the show consists of professionals showing cattle as a business promotion.

For them, the money does not come until after the show, or even after a tour of several expositions. The money comes when a rancher-client decides to upgrade his herd by crossbreeding his animals with higher quality stock. Then he turns to the prize winners for a cow, calf, bull or a vial of semen.

The state Department of Agriculture estimates the beef industry exerts $24 billion worth of impact on the economy while providing some 308,000 jobs in Texas alone.

Figures show Texas leads the country in number of calves born, number of cattle on feed and number of cattle slaughtered. It has more farms and ranches than any other state. Compared to population, that is virtually one head for every man, woman and child in Texas.

Thanks to genetic engineers, cattle have been molded into super breeds and refined for maximum growth through hybridization, artificial insemination, and, in some cases, embryonic transplants. The result of that effort is cattle that produce more meat more quickly and at more cost efficient rates.

The Fort Worth show is important because it is the most prestigious form of advertising for a breeder.
