Reagan's budget draws predictions of fiscal gloom

United Press International
President Reagan's proposed budget is causing a storm of debate on Capitol Hill and drawing predictions of more fiscal gloom from a think tank of conservative economists.

The budget proposal, which projects a record deficit of $91.5 billion next year, would keep interest rates up and slow economic expansion, economists from the American Enterprise Institute said.

On Capitol Hill, Reagan's proposed fiscal 1983 budget of $757.6 billion drew groans from both Democrats and Republicans, who seemed determined to alter it because of the fat deficit.

The deficit worries spread to Wall Street where prices plunged to their lowest point this year.

The Dow Jones industrial average, a 4-point winner Friday, dived 17.60 points to 833.42, its lowest point since it hit 832.95 on Oct. 29.

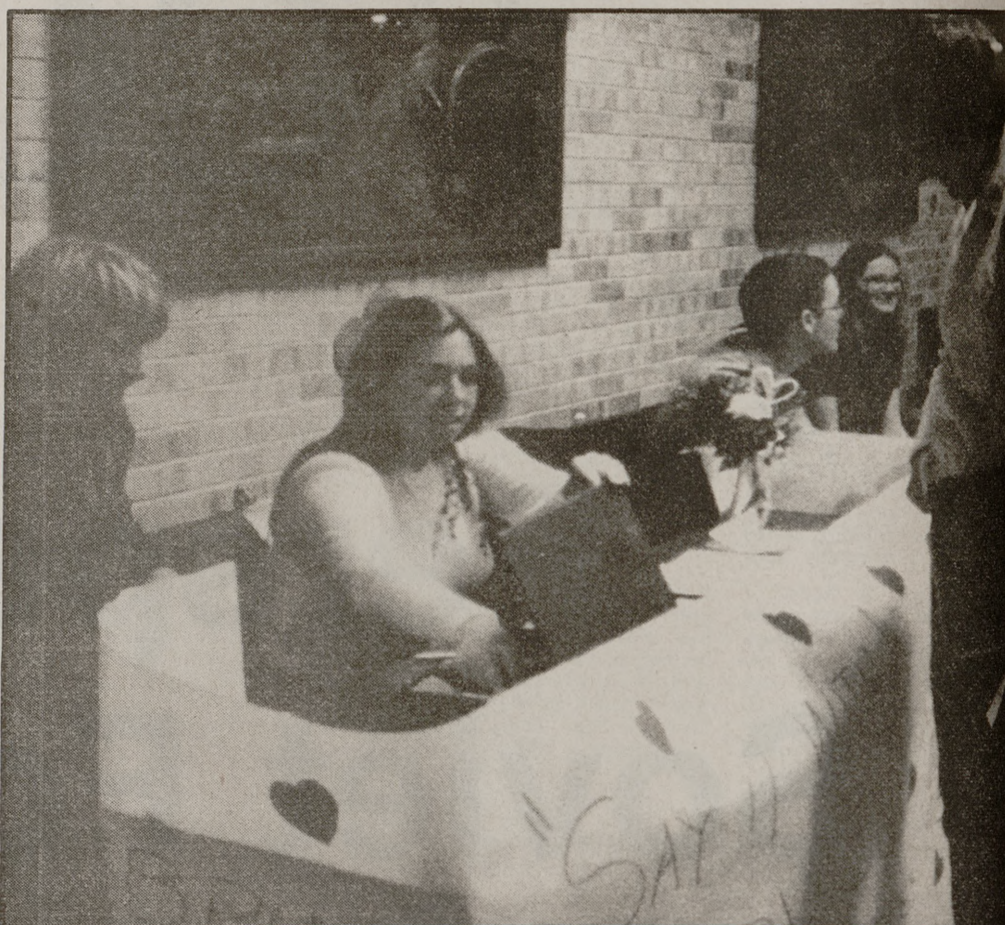

The New York Stock Exchange index fell 1.47 points to 66.32, and the price of an average share decreased 62 cents.

Economists from the American Enterprise Institute agreed the deficit is too large, but disagreed on how to deflate it.

In another congressional debate Monday, defenders of the metric system argued Reagan's proposal to abandon voluntary conversion efforts would wind up costing more than it saves, while also hurting trade.

The administration's 1983 budget proposal would eliminate $2 million for the 7-year-old U.S. Metric Board, an independent agency charged with assisting the public on metric conversion.

The United States is the last industrial nation to retain the English inch and pound standards, and most American industries sell all or part of their products under metric standards or with metric labeling.
