

Deep Throat shown at UH, educational value questioned

United Press International
HOUSTON — A district attorney isn't sure if the controversial movie "Deep Throat" is educational or not, but he says he doesn't plan any legal action against University of Houston students who organized a weekend showing of the film.

Despite pressure from several anti-pornography groups, Harris County District Attorney John Holmes said Tuesday he has no actions against the students who organized the free showing to about 500 other students Saturday.

Holmes said "Deep Throat" would be shown at the university for an educational purpose, even though the movie has been judged obscene.

"It has to be of educational value," Holmes said. "A jury would have reasonable doubt that the movie has any educational value. We are dealing with a science without the answers in the back of the book."

Holmes said he does not believe the students wanted to break the law. "If they really wanted to flout the law, they wouldn't have called us," he said.

Prior to the private showing, UH students checked with the district attorney's office to make sure they were not violating Texas pornography laws.

Julie Huebner, student president of program council, said she was told by prosecutors that the audience would have to be limited to a private university audience. No fee could be charged for entrance, and viewers had to be over 18.

"They told us we had to follow these procedures because the movie was obscene," Huebner said, adding she did follow the rules.

Geneva Kirk Brooks, president of Citizens Against Pornography, and members of Morality in Media, the Moral Majority and anti-abortion groups asked the district attorney Tuesday to take action.

"I don't send my children to college so they can see obscene movies," Brooks said. "We are very concerned this is happening."

Plano boy spots Coors ad error

United Press International
PLANO — Millard Fillmore have been the best president — as actors in a Coors beer commercial contend — but their risk of the brewery's mistake.

In the Adolph Coors advertising campaign for its premium beer, Herman Joseph's, two exchange comments on the "small-time bests" of various categories.

that a young man like that would notice it; apparently most people didn't."

In one commercial, one man says Millard Fillmore was the president — "less time, less mistakes."

David Jurcak, a student at Millard Middle School in Plano, claiming no offense to Fillmore, says the 13th president's term was not as short as that of William H. Harrison, who died of pneumonia in 1841 — one month after his inauguration.

Since he was in the hospital the whole time, he couldn't have made any mistakes," Jurcak said.

Fillmore served for two years, 1850-52, succeeding Zachary Taylor who died in office.

Jurcak, 14, who admits to daydreaming in his American history class, wrote the Colorado brewery of the mistake. Coors officials responded with embarrassment.

"At least we know that somebody knows the history of the United States," said Mel Linn, Coors vice president for sales in Golden, Colo. He said Jurcak was the first person to notify the company of the error.

He added that the company was embarrassed by the mistake.

Jonathan Runge, who handled the Herman Joseph's account for the Ted Bates of New York advertising agency, said the commercial was meant to express an opinion, not a fact.

Runge, who said the agency received a few letters commenting on the "less time" angle of the commercial, said the creators knew Fillmore had not served the shortest time, but that history books recognize the lack of action by the man who later was president for the "Know-nothing" party.

"It's humorous really," Linn said. "It's even more interesting
