Suspected terrorists arrested

United Press International
ROME — Police announced Monday they arrested four suspected members of the Red Brigades terrorist gang, including one registered nurse accused of treating wounded members.

Police identified the nurse as Paolo Maturi, 27, employed in the gynecology department of Rome's San Giovanni hospital. The arrest was made two weeks ago, but police said it was kept secret so as not to prejudice their investigation.

Investigators said the nurse is accused of extracting a bullet from the left arm of Giovanni Alimonti, 27, the suspected Red Brigades member who worked as a telephone operator in the central Parliament offices.

Police say Alimonti apparently was wounded in the Red Brigades' Jan. 6 attempt to kidnap Nicola Simone, deputy chief of Rome's anti-terrorist police squad. Simone fired a shot that wounded one of his would-be kidnapers before being seriously wounded himself.

Alimonti has been absent from his Parliament job since the shooting.

Maturi also was suspected of having treated other wounded Red Brigades members in the past, police said.

Police in the city of Livorno in northern Italy said they arrested three dock workers suspected of being Red Brigades supporters. Officers said the three were not major figures in the leftist gang, but that they were believed to have provided it with logistical evidence.

Who wears the pants?

LA drivers pay more in '81; Detroit motorists off the hook

United Press International
DETROIT — Detroit residents live in the cheapest place to drive, while Los Angeles motorists shelled out the most per mile in 1981, a survey of driving costs in the nation's 20 largest cities shows.

The annual survey, released Sunday by the Hertz Corporation, showed the average cost per mile to own and operate an auto in the cities surveyed was 47.3 cents, up from 39.7 cents in 1980.

Detroit, where automobiles dominate virtually every aspect of life, placed 20th on the Hertz list at 41.9 cents per mile. Los Angeles was first for the third straight year at 57.9 cents per mile and New York came in second at 56.6 cents per mile.

An earlier Hertz study showed the average cost to own and operate a car nationwide in 1981 was 44.5 cents per mile. The American Automobile Association, however, pegged the cost at 24.7 cents.

Major city costs normally are higher than the national average because of higher sales taxes and insurance premiums.

The car rental and leasing company blamed the boost in driving costs on high car prices and soaring interest rates. The average compact cost about $7,694 equipped with automatic transmission, power steering, brakes and air conditioning.

Hertz said fixed costs such as depreciation, insurance and interest rates accounted for 31.3 cents of the big city average. Variables such as maintenance, repairs and gasoline accounted for 11.4 cents.

While high prices and interest rates played the biggest part in determining the per-mile cost, Hertz said insurance premiums could change costs by several cents a mile.

San Francisco, the nation's third most expensive city to drive in, had the most expensive cars, highest maintenance costs and service station items including fuel. Detroit had the cheapest cars and service station costs.

Insurance cost most in Los Angeles, least in Washington. Atlanta had the cheapest maintenance costs.

The highest cities in order of ranking were Los Angeles, 57.9 cents; New York City, 56.6 cents; San Francisco, 56.2 cents; Miami, 49.7 cents; Chicago, 48.5 cents and Seattle, 47.6 cents.

The middle group included Denver, 46.5 cents; Houston, 46.5 cents; St. Louis, 46.5 cents; San Diego, 46.4 cents; Boston, 46.3 cents; Minneapolis, 46 cents; Milwaukee, 45.8 cents; Pittsburgh, 45.7 cents; Cleveland, 45 cents; Washington, 44.6 cents.

The bottom four cities were Dallas, 43.6 cents; Cincinnati, 42.9 cents; Atlanta, 42.6 cents; and Detroit, 41.9 cents.
