Indoor lips chap too

United Press International

BOULDER, Colo. — People who spend a lot of time indoors in winter can suffer the same chapped lips problems that plague skiers and other outdoor sports participants.

Tony E. Jones, a medicinal chemistry professor, says the main problem involves changing moisture content of the air — as you go from the dry cold outdoors to an even drier, warm indoors environment.

Too much central heat tends to draw humidity from the air, Jones says, and people lick their lips more often in a dry room, just as they do when faced with the drying effects of sun, wind and cold outdoors. The moisture on your lips evaporates, he says, often causing chapping and cracking.

To combat this, he suggests drinking lots of water, using a humidifier indoors and coating your lips regularly with a medicated lip ointment or balm to prevent moisture loss. He also recommends surrounding yourself with green plants — they help keep humidity up indoors.

Jones is director of research for Blistex, Inc. and a faculty member of the University of Colorado.

Lana Turner stars as Chase Gioberti's mother, who shows up under mysterious circumstances, on "Falcon's Crest," Friday on CBS.
