Market trading halted; Mexican peso devalued

United Press International
MEXICO CITY — The Mexican peso plummeted 30 percent in value against the dollar Thursday in the wake of a government decision to stop propping up the overvalued currency.
The privately-owned Banco de Comercio, after waiting most of Thursday morning before opening trading, started trading at 38.35 pesos to buy a dollar and paying 36.85 pesos to customers selling dollars.
One department store manager in Laredo, said he was charging 40 pesos to the dollar for Mexican customers wishing to exchange currencies.
The bank's new rate meant the peso was worth 2.7 U.S. cents, a 30-percent drop compared with Wednesday's price of 3.69 cents. Other banks continued to suspend trading in all currencies, gold and silver after the government's central bank pulled out of the money exchange market.
"We are not going to do any buying or selling (of currencies), possibly for the entire day," said Aracely Rocha, investment counselor of the privately-owned Banca Serfin. "There is no exchange of anything."
She said her bank also would not buy or sell gold and silver, and the only transactions would be deposits or withdrawals in peso or dollar accounts, but only the respective currency.
"The telephones have been ringing all day asking what is going on," she said.
Jose Ramirez, a clerk at the privately-owned Banco de Comercio's airport branch, said his bank normally begins money exchanges at 7 a.m. But Thursday, he said: "I don't think we will even open today."
One executive of another private bank, Banpais, said high-level meetings were taking place between directors of the government central bank and top private bankers to resolve the paralysis. The crisis erupted after the government's Banco de Mexico announced it would pull out of the money exchange market, triggering expectations of a steep devaluation of the peso against the dollar and Western European currencies.

Banco de Mexico, the government's central bank equivalent to the U.S. Federal Reserve, announced unexpectedly late Wednesday that it was suspending trading in currencies and dropping its behind-the-scene support of the peso.
Financial analysts mounted to the first large devaluation of the peso since August, 1976, when the currency plunged 45 percent.
A presidential communique Wednesday said the national money market "came wracked with confusion," requiring the government to intervene.
The presidential communique made no direct mention of devaluation. It said, "although the Mexican peso was 'not necessarily valued,' but the peso is 'adapted to our national interests.'"
The communique said Mexico never would allow speculators or confused interests, "echoing rhetoric frequently used by President Jose Lopez Portillo."
During the past year, the central bank has devalued the peso by about 15 percent in a series of less than a tenth of a month. Lopez Portillo's separate news conference vowed he would fight "dog" to protect the peso's value.
By analyzing the decision to suspend trading, the peso was virtually as announcing a major devaluation.
The Banco de Mexico action was necessary because shrinking world demand for such Mexican exports as coffee, cotton and the general effect of interest rates and a world recession.
The statement said the government would reserve the right to back into the currency market when ever it de-

Scientist uses weather, Sat predicts moods, health

United Press International
NEW YORK — Weather getting you down? You can do something about it.
Stephen Rosen, a research scientist who has studied how weather affects people, says among symptoms that have been shown to correlate with weather's extremes are tiredness, bad moods, a disinclination to work, head pressure and restlessness.
Rosen, who holds a Ph.D. in physics, said, "there are subtle effects of weather in five particular areas — medication, clothing, exercise, travel and food."
People should be aware, he said, that weather can alter the toxicity, potency and side effects of medicines. They need to know how to dress for the cold and to take precautions, for example, on returning north from a warm climate because body processes change due to the stress of cold.
Just as severe weather is a form of stress, so is exercise. The jogger may be well advised to somewhat reduce his or her running schedule.
Regarding food, he said, the body needs more fuel in cold weather, less in hot weather.
Rosen is the author of a book on the subject, "Weathering: How the Atmosphere Conditions Your Body, Your Mind, Your Moods and Your Health". He includes these tips:
• In extreme cold, eat high protein, high fat foods. Five meals a day provide more efficient utilization of fat as energy than three meals.
• Do warm up exercises indoors before going outside to exercise in the cold.
• In extreme cold, avoid being motionless for extended periods.
• Drink plenty of water in winter. Water will help dry mucous membranes and hydrate and your body temperature constant.
• Wear layered clothing. Air-filled spaces between layers is effective in avoiding fabrics that breathe such as rubber-plasticized fabrics.
• Your head resembles a hot jug without its cap. Heat will depart through the head like steam through a thermos. Keep your head covered in very cold weather.
• Humidity in winter humidifier, water-filled over radiators, boiling the stove.
Rosen said, your mood can change as a result of weather. It's important to be able to attribute this weather rather than yourself.
Rosen believes what health weather forecasts properly — biometeorology forecasting, would benefit the medical profession and the general public. He is a consultant to a Minneapolis firm, Data Inc.
"The more people know about themselves and how into the environment, they'll be able to cope with the effects of the weather."

Dodo meets Izod
United Press International
RIO DE JANEIRO, Brazil — Dodo the burglar thought he found a safe hideout on top of a log — until he discovered the log was a sleeping alligator named "Ugly."
Carlos Salvador da Silva, 22, known in his neighborhood as Dodo, wanted to get his hands on some extra money to celebrate Rio's carnival this weekend.
Early Wednesday Da Silva broke into the home of Adelino Braga, 51, police said.
But as Dodo looked for cash and jewels, he made too much noise and woke up Braga and his wife who shouted, "We're being robbed! There's a thief around here!"
Dodo tried to make his getaway but as lights came on in the neighborhood he decided to hide in the Braga's big backyard. He jumped into an old bathtub and crouched down next to what he thought was a log.
It was no log. It was the sleeping, 12-year-old alligator, "Ugly."
Dodo jumped out of the bathtub yelling, "Let me out of here!"
Police obliged.

United Press International
DETROIT — General Motors Corp. wants to reopen early contract talks with the United Auto Workers using the recent Ford Motor Co. settlement as a starting point, the Detroit News reported Thursday.
The News said in a copyright story GM Chairman Roger B. Smith has received letters from UAW members asking that the company and the union return to the bargaining table as soon as possible.
Smith, in his first interview since the union's settlement with Ford, told the newspaper Wednesday he agrees a speedy resumption of UAW-GM talks is "probably the best course that I see right now."
Contract talks at GM broke down Jan. 28 and have been rescheduled before the national mid-July starting date. The current three-year contract expires Sept. 14.
"If you were a UAW member, would you gamble that the 14 the economy would be wild upswing," thus ending the union's bargaining power, Smith asked in the interview. "I don't know."
"Obviously the first step is start working from the agreement," Smith said. "I would think the union would want to have continuous good relations with the UAW. We talk every day. We'll be talking them again when we see Ford ratification goes."
