Russia may need help to boost low economy

United Press International
WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union's ailing economy, plagued by mismanagement, poor crops and a low growth rate, is expected to foster a growing Soviet demand for Western technology and goods, a congressional study said Saturday.

The key problems experienced by most communist bloc nations — especially in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union — are lagging agricultural performances, high hard currency debts to the West and not enough energy supplies, the study said.

The bottom line, as explained by a Congressional Research Service commentary, is that "the Eastern nations will have increasing needs for Western technology, grain and credit."

The study contains reports from the State Department and other executive departments and agencies to the effect that U.S. trade with communist nations — though small in terms of overall trade — yielded a $5.1 billion surplus to the United States in 1980 and resulted in the employment of more than 300,000 Americans.

The 73-page study, put together by the Congressional Research Service, deals with several aspects of East-West trade. It was released by Rep. Henry Reuss, D-Wis., chairman of Congress' Joint Economic Committee.

"The Soviet economy," said a section prepared by the State Department, "will continue to grow over the next few years but at markedly lower rates than compared with the 1960s and early 1970s."

"General mismanagement in an overly centralized economy — where there are still no signs of any meaningful reform that would produce results in the next few years — casts doubts over whether even the lower industrial growth targets (of the 1981-1985 five-year plan) will be met in their entirety."

The report said that recurring and persistent problems in agriculture add to the economic dilemma facing the Soviet leadership over the next few years on matters of investment, consumer welfare and defense spending.

"Against such a backdrop, Soviet demand for Western machinery, equipment and materials will continue to grow — especially for high technology goods," the State Department report said.

Improved prisons sought by judge

United Press International
LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — A federal judge considering the dismissal of a 13-year-old lawsuit against the state prison system told state officials more progress must be made in improving prison conditions.

Judge G. Thomas Eisele set a timetable for possibly dismissing the lawsuit contesting unconstitutional prison conditions Friday. The judge said he may enter a final order in the case Monday.

In the opinion that outlined his comments at the end of oral testimony in the case in October, Eisele noted some areas in which the state Correction Department had not met compliance with constitutional standards, previous court orders or the 1978 consent decree that was designed to close the case.

Eisele ordered the Correction Department to submit a plan within 30 days to resolve the safety problem of inmates being housed in a large, 100-bed open barracks and a plan for integrating prisoners in the Cummins state prison unit maximum security facility and in two other barracks.

The judge also directed the department to improve its plan for staff integration and to end the use of inmates in security positions.

He warned the department not to back away from its commitment to provide adequate mental health services.

Eisele said if the department met the requirements, he would consider dismissing the case as soon as this summer.

The judge said evidence presented during hearings last year indicated the prison system substantially was in compliance with constitutional standards.
