Estimates say ozone costs farmers billions of dollars

United Press International
WASHINGTON — Ozone, a major air pollutant, is cutting yields of four major crops by an estimated $1.9 billion to $4.5 billion a year, a government research report says.

The figures, which reflect a dramatic increase from previous estimates of ozone damage to crops, represent only the impact of that pollutant on corn, wheat, soybeans and peanuts and do not count other pollutants known to damage crops. Soybeans were hardest hit in tests, suffering about 64 percent of dollar losses from ozone, which is formed when hydrocarbons from burned fuel react with sunlight. Research showed that corn suffered 17 percent, wheat suffered 12 percent and peanuts suffered 7 percent. Rep. George Brown, D-Calif., who released the study this week, said estimates that 5 percent of total agricultural production is lost would be much higher if they took into account other pollutants and their effects on other crops and forestry.

than preliminary projections the network issued last year, which estimated crop losses from air pollution between $1 billion and $2 billion a year. In releasing the report, Brown lambasted the administration for withholding funding for the network this year and for proposing cuts for next year.

Brown said the program, started in fiscal 1980, must be permitted to run for six years as previously planned to give policy makers data for making regulatory decisions on air pollution. Release of the report corresponded with an Izaak Walton League symposium on effects of air pollution on farm commodities. In a speech to the symposium, Brown said: "Early detection of these chronic crop losses allows us time to adjust pollution abatement programs and agricultural practices before widespread crop failure occurs." — Rep. George Brown, D-Calif.

ing them would "only costs to the farmer and farmer to suffer a loss of ductivity," Brown said. Brown said research five to 10 years away in success in breeding crop tant to air pollution. Also at the symposium, ward Heggstad, a plantologist with the Agricultural Department's Agricultural Research Service, said evidence shows that pollution is one reason crops have not improved since mid-1960s. And he warned that dioxide levels increase as a power and heat combined ozone and sulfur would cause even more losses.

Brown said crop losses due to pollution are estimated to be at least $1 billion in California. In Brown's congressional district in southern California, air pollution from Los Angeles caused a 70 percent yield loss in Zinfandel grapes, forcing farmers to stop production. Navel orange losses to pollution were estimated at 50 percent and lemon losses at 30 percent.

Research that produced the new estimates was conducted by the National Crop Loss Assessment Network, a program funded by the Environmental Protection Agency. Estimates in the report turned out to be even larger tration for withholding funding for the network this year and for proposing cuts for next year.

Brown said the program, started in fiscal 1980, must be permitted to run for six years as previously planned to give policy makers data for making regulatory decisions on air pollution. Release of the report corresponded with an Izaak Walton League symposium on effects of air pollution on farm commodities.

In a speech to the symposium, Brown said: "Early detection of these chronic crop losses allows us time to adjust pollution abatement programs and agricultural practices before widespread crop failure occurs." Improved data on crop losses to ozone come at a time when an effort is being made to relax air pollution standards, but relax-between 1946 and 1960 then, they have reached a plateau in spite of improvements in varieties. His and research by other led him to conclude that pollution is partly to blame.

Pollution studies conducted in California show ozone levels are higher in cotton states. Comparison's most popular variety in normal air and non-filtered air showed a 15 percent yield loss in chemical smog. At the Agricultural Center in Beltsville, existing ozone levels yield losses and altered seed quality in four cotton varieties.

"It is the prolonged to low levels of pollutant mixtures of pollutants concerns us most," Hegg-
