Girl named hero for saving father

United Press International
DALLAS — When Kim Bryant socked an angry bull in the nose with a whip last fall, she figured it might save her father, who was under attack by the animal. But she never dreamed it would make her a hero.

The Texas Farm and Ranch Safety Council chose the Sulphur Springs girl, 16, as the recipient of its Rural Heroism Award for 1981. She received the award Monday during the annual meeting of the Texas Safety Association.

Bryant was helping her father, Lyle Bryant, drive a bull back to their farm near Peerless in Hopkins County east of Dallas last November. The bull had strayed onto a neighbor's property.

While passing through the neighbor's pen on the way back to the Bryant farm, the animal turned and charged Mr. Bryant, ramming him against a fence, then tossing him in the air twice.

As the bull continued its attack on her father on the ground, Bryant began striking the bull with the whip she carried.

"The whip didn't faze him much," she said. "But my grandfather told me once if you want to get a cow's attention, to hit him on the nose."

She struck the bull across the bridge of its nose with the handle of the whip. The blow stopped the bull's attack, so she hit the animal again. With the bull temporarily stunned, she helped her father from the pen and shut the gate.

"Daddy was in trouble and I just did as I had been told," she said. "I didn't think much about it."

The girl's father spent nine days in the hospital with a broken rib, a minor shoulder fracture, cuts and bruises. But he was happy to be alive.

However, the experience may have a lasting influence on Bryant. She said her career plans now were divided between being a nurse or being a veterinarian.

As for the bull, Bryant said it made it back to her family's farm, but its stay was brief.

"We don't have him anymore. He was sent to the packers," she said. "I guess there was a little bit of revenge in that."

Brown's appointment debated

Houston hot over chief's job

United Press International
HOUSTON — A town meeting called to discuss whether Atlanta's Commissioner of Public Safety Lee Brown should be police chief here brought citizens who were for and against the man — and an uninvited visitor from the Ku Klux Klan.

About 350 people attended Monday night's meeting to discuss the appointment of the city's first black chief and police were called to escort black citizens to their cars and protect them from the hooded Klan members.

City Council was to vote on Brown's appointment Tuesday. Mayor Kathy Whitmire said she is confident he will get the job.

The community appears to be split on whether Brown should be hired. Police say they would prefer someone from within their ranks to be promoted, but Whitmire said Brown is the most qualified for the job.

There was no violence Monday at the meeting, but the 13 klansmen — some clad in white sheets and others in black clothes with no masks — were told by Councilman John Goodner they could come into the meeting, but without their robes.

The men refused, claiming their civil rights had been violated.

Members of a police organization who traveled to Atlanta last week to check on Brown's credentials released a report of their findings Monday.

They said Brown's failures are that he does not delegate authority, has poor relations with the media and was blamed for poor recruiting and training in Atlanta.

Coronary bypass aids other surgery

United Press International
A successful coronary bypass may improve the success of blood-vessel surgery elsewhere in the body, according to Jesse Thompson, head of vascular surgery at Baylor Medical Center in Dallas.

Designed to avert heart attacks, the bypass reroutes blood that cannot flow easily through coronary arteries clogged with fatty deposits. Customarily, another vessel — usually a vein snipped from the patient's leg — is used to make a new connection between the aorta and a coronary artery, which supplies the heart with blood.

However, some patients need additional surgery to relieve blockages in the vessels of the neck or legs. Studies done at Baylor and at the Cleveland Clinic in Ohio showed an 80 percent lower death rate during surgery for patients who had the coronary bypass first.
