Volcano erupts again as death toll mounts

United Press International
PICHUCALCO, Mexico — The Chichon volcano spit out more rock and ash on villagers still cleaning up an earlier eruption that killed at least 50 villagers and dumped a billion tons of ash in the remote area.

"It was the volcano's last kick," army captain Raul Ocana said in Villahermosa, some 450 miles southeast of Mexico City.

Peasants in the town of Pichucalco, near the 7,300-foot volcano, said the second and smaller eruption occurred about 2:30 p.m. Wednesday. Red Cross officials said slight tremors that shook the area in the morning may have caused the latest eruption.

"It's like breathing in a lot of cigarette smoke," said one man of the fine ash that fell on Villahermosa. A heavy blanket of ash also was reported in Tuxtla Gutierrez.

At least 50 people were killed in a massive eruption Sunday — the first in centuries — that officials said spewed ash and "fire rocks" across 10 square miles and forced the evacuation of at least 20,000 people.

"There have been at least 50 deaths," said Antonio Perez Suarez, squad chief of the Villahermosa Red Cross. He led the first rescue workers into the devastated region.

Red Cross officials in Villahermosa said two of seven severely burned people died Tuesday and the others were not expected to live. All had been burned over 90 percent of their bodies when their houses were ignited by the hot ash and rock.

"My five children burned to death," said Nicasio Rueda Diaz, a resident of Nicalpa, a town on the slopes of the volcano. "When I went to look for them, I found only ashes. The house wasn't there anymore."

"My 3-year-old son died there," said Roman Nondragon, another resident of Nicalpa said. "He was in the house when a 'fire rock' hit him in the head" — the local term for the hot volcanic stones thrown from the volcano.

Many of the refugees in Pichucalco, who have not eaten for three days, said they did not think they would be able to go back to their villages.

"There's nothing left on the mountain, only stones and ashes," one villager said. He said all the villagers cultivated coffee but the land was now unusable.

The entire state of Chiapas is covered by white and gray ash, like a heavy snowfall. The trees are all white and people walking in streets wear surgical masks to keep the choking ash from their lungs.
