Sheldon Lee Glashow is the Higgins Professor of Physics at Harvard University. He has made many important contributions to the theory of elementary particles, for which he received the Nobel Prize in 1979.

For 3000 years man has searched for the fundamental units of matter and the forces by which they interact. As sophistication of the search improved, a succession of apparently fundamental units appeared: the atom, the nucleus, the hadron, and most recently, the quark and lepton. We may have discovered the truly indivisible units of which the universe is made. At the same time, a unified field theory has developed which may describe all of the fundamental forces of nature in terms of a single symmetry of the universe.

Class requires project to serve community

by Susan Talbot

The Twin City Mission has a new coat of paint thanks to members of an aerospace studies class and some cadets from Squadron 15.

Part of the curriculum in Aerospace Studies 304, a management course for future officers, includes the planning and execution of a public service project.

Students are required to form committees of two or more, plan projects, carry them out and write up the results.

Andy MacDonald, a junior electrical engineering major, and Glenn Swisher, a junior civil engineering major, both from Houston, scraped and painted the Twin City Mission second-hand clothing store for their project.

The mission supplied the paint and the supplies required for the project.

"Our job was to get the people there, scrape the old paint off, and paint," he said.

Twin City Mission is a non-profit organization at 500 N.

Main in Bryan.

MacDonald and asked freshmen and sophomores in their outfit.

Six people worked in the building for four to five days for two weekends.

Projects of the other classes included taking children to a Texas A&M game and taking seniors out to dinner.

The project was a place of the term used to be assigned.
