Democrats say Reagan causing pain, suffering

United Press International
DETROIT — Sen. Carl Levin, delivering the Democratic response to President Reagan's radio address from chilly Detroit, Saturday, invited Reagan to view the "pain and suffering" his economic program has caused when he returns from his tropical vacation.

The Democrats picked Detroit, a city devastated by depressed auto sales, for their response to stand in stark contrast to the balmy Caribbean resort from which Reagan delivered his "fireside chat" radio address. Democrats dubbed the speech Reagan's "surfside chat."

Levin, a first-term Michigan senator, said his state is "bleeding economically" with 17 percent unemployment.

"The American people don't mind the president traveling to the Caribbean for a vacation," Levin said. "But they do mind him telling them that they have to travel — to abandon their communities and their families, flee from those regions of this country hardest hit by the recession and tramp across the highways in search of work."

After delivering his speech from the studios of WXYZ radio, Levin said he thought Reagan could use an education on the severity of Michigan's depression.

"I think it's the best place for him to come," Levin told reporters. "He's removed himself from the entire pain and suffering of his economic policies."

In his speech, Levin challenged Reagan's remarks about the student loan program. "The president created an impression today — I think a wrong impression — that there are only administrative cuts," he said.

In his speech from Barbados, Reagan denied he was "snatching away" grants and loans from millions of needy college students, but said he was cutting administrative costs that result in more money for needy students.

Fumes spread northward

Volcanic ash hits Texas

United Press International
BROWNSVILLE — Residents trying to cope with an onslaught of ash blown north from a volcano in southern Mexico washed their cars carefully, kept windows closed and took special care with respiratory problems.

About 1.25 billion tons of volcanic ash and fumes were swept into the air when the Chichon volcano in southern Mexico first erupted last week. Enough of the brownish-gray material traveled more than 1,000 miles north to reduce visibility in the Brownsville area to 2.5 miles Friday.

The cloud of silicon dioxide, also known as natural glass, first approached the area Monday, but was pushed back to the Gulf of Mexico by northerly winds. Wednesday, winds shifted and brought the ash back to Brownsville. Residents in the predominantly Catholic city christened the day "Ash Wednesday."

In this last week of Lent, however, observers said the second dusting affected people of all religions indiscriminately.

The extremely abrasive ash resembles very minute glass shards, scientists said. People have been advised not to wipe the ash away from their cars or to use windshield wipers without water, because the ash could damage both glass and paint. The ash also made its way into some houses.

An increase of patients complaining of respiratory problems has been reported by hospital spokesmen. They are un-

Stamp collectors could take licking in Falkland crisis

United Press International
HOUSTON — There's more hanging on the outcome of the Falkland Islands crisis than just international politics: stamp collectors, it seems, have a stake in it too.

Stamp dealers coast to coast report a run on the popular Falkland Island stamps, which — depending on whether Great Britain or Argentina prevails — could jump manifold in value. It could go either way, dealers say: Argentina could overprint its domestic stamps with a Falklands designation, or take existing British Falklands stamps and overprint them.

One of the first acts of a conquering government, says Bob Dumaine of the Sam Houston Philatelics group, is to change the stamps.

Dumaine says Falkland stamps range in value from $6,000 for the 1933 "Rose and Black" down to $20 for current issue sets.

"My bet is that Great Britain will prevail and that the supply of stamps during this time will end up being fairly valuable," he said.

But should Argentina prevail, Dumaine said stamps issued by the Falklands would not be very popular.

"On a scale of one to ten, the Falklands would score a six (with British markings) and the Argies would be a one," he said.
