employer in the past. After investigating potential employers, students attend a counseling session with a director and decide where they would like to work.

A cover recommendation letter and a copy of the co-op degree plan are sent to the employer with the student's application. The employer is asked to make a decision in three to four weeks. The offer or rejection letter is sent directly to the student.

Students who participate in the co-op program must have a minimum grade point average of 2.5. Students also may receive academic credit, if his college offers credit for co-oping. The colleges of liberal arts and geosciences do not offer academic credit for co-oping.

Students who receive academic credit for co-oping are considered full-time students, and pay tuition and fees. They have Texas A&M ID cards and are free to participate in campus activities.

Students not registered for co-op credit must file for re-admission to the University before entering school following a work term, except when they co-op in the summer.

Co-oping provides a break from school that many students need, Yates said. The co-op program also gives opportunity for student growth and maturing through development of good professional work habits, he said.

Dr. Henry Pope, the Liberal Arts Cooperative Education

Program coordinator, said co-oping gives a student the chance to gain new friendships and social experiences. A student also earns money that could help defray college costs, he said.

Texas A&M co-op students earned $3.6 million during the 1980-81 school year, Yates said. Cooperative education could not continue to exist without providing services for business and industry, he said.

Many companies hire co-op students after they graduate because they already are trained and save companies recruiting time, Yates said.

Pope said: "They (co-op students) can have a job before they graduate."

However, Yates said no student obligation to full-time employment by co-op employer and no obligation to offer full-time employment.

The co-op program sends disadvantages to students. The first is that for one semester, Yates can interfere with the of a student's involvements.

About 1,300 Texas students participate in the program.

Students who complete a co-op program receive a Cooperative Certificate when they
