

Debate on coal slurry lines, water rights splits Senate

United Press International
WASHINGTON — Opponents of coal slurry pipelines said Tuesday that granting pipelines the right of federal eminent domain would only cause further rancor and lead to law suits among the 10 states that constitute the Missouri River basin.

The Senate Energy Committee has been badly split over concerns about what impact the coal slurry pipelines, which would move a mixture of crushed coal and water from Western mines to consumers in the South, would have on water supplies in the West.

The critics said they were unconvinced that amendments by Sen. Malcolm Wallop, R-Wyo., would adequately protect state water rights.

Sen. John Danforth, R-Mo., said although Wallop

had proposed amendments to protect state water rights, "I am not convinced that they do the job."

Sen. Edward Zorinsky, D-Neb., said development of coal slurry pipelines must not be at the expense of agriculture "and its need for what is already a diminishing supply of water."

The coal slurry companies have had trouble building their pipelines because railroads, which presently haul most coal shipments and don't want the competition, won't grant them rights-of-way to cross their land.

The committee is holding hearings on legislation by Sen. J. Bennett Johnston, D-La., to let the secretary of energy allow coal slurry pipelines to obtain rights-of-way by invoking federal eminent domain authority if he determines the coal pipelines are in the national interest.

Although the bill would stipulate that water rights cannot be obtained by federal eminent domain authority, Western senators have been worried that the coal slurry pipelines would usurp existing state water rights.

Supporters of the coal slurry pipelines believe that several amendments by Wallop will allay some of those fears.

Brazilian 727 jet with 135 aboard crashes in storm

United Press International
FORTALEZA, Brazil — A jetliner with 135 people aboard crashed into coastal mountains Tuesday in a rainstorm while on its approach to an airport in northeastern Brazil, the domestic airline VASP said.

Unofficial reports said bodies and wreckage were strewn over a wide area and that there may have been survivors.

The crash was the second involving a VASP jetliner in less than a month.

A VASP spokesman said the Boeing 727 jet was five miles from Fortaleza when it lost contact with the control tower over the Serra da Pacatuba mountains.

"The place is inaccessible," said Fire Chief Rodrigues De Oliveira. We have 35 men standing by in the nearest village but they can't get to the scene."

The plane hit a 2,500-foot peak, he said.

The domestic flight originated in Sao Paulo and made a stop in Rio De Janeiro before continuing northward. It carried 126 passengers and nine crew members.

While there was no immediate information as to the nationality of the 126 passengers, a first report said many were Brazilian businessmen returning from a textile fair in Sao Paulo.

A VASP employee in Fortaleza said that the weather was "awful, just raining all the time" at the time of the crash.

Radio reports said search and rescue teams from the Brazilian Air Force were flying over the mountainside under a low cloud ceiling but there was no immediate word that wreckage had been sighted.

A previous crash occurred when a VASP 737 broke in two on landing at Brasilia on May 24, killing two people.

Fortaleza, capital of the state of Ceara, is more than 1,300 miles northeast of Rio De Janeiro in Brazil's impoverished northeastern region.

Police raid Moonies in France

United Press International
PARIS — Police Tuesday carried out a nationwide raid on offices and buildings housing members of the Unification Church of the Rev. Sun Myung Moon and took 45 people into custody for questioning.

It was the first major police intervention in the activities of the Moon sect members.

The operation was ordered by Judge Jean Bruel of Besancon in eastern France. The judge is investigating a controversial case in which a French family has charged that its daughter Claire Chateau, 21, has been induced into membership of the sect against her will, a charge the sect and Chateau have denied.

A large number of police took part in the raids on 13 buildings owned by the Moon church in the Paris area and eight centers of the sect located in Lyon, Lille, Orleans, Rouen, Strasbourg and Rennes.

Police said 30 persons were taken in for questioning in Paris and 15 in provincial towns. Police, which included members of the criminal and economic branches, also have seized a large number of documents including lists of members and accounting papers, police officials said.

Pierre Ceyrac, the Unification Church's representative for France, said: "I wish to sharply protest against this behavior. We are no longer at the time of Inquisition."

The sect's activities in France came into the limelight last March 3 when Chateau's parents, helped by five friends, abducted their daughter with the help of several friends while she was in Besancon distributing the sect's leaflets in the streets.

Claire's parents and five other participants in the abduction who took Claire to an isolated farm failed in their effort at "deprogramming" her. They eventually were charged with illegally holding the young French woman, while Claire returned to the sect asserting that she had joined it of her free will and that she found "the things I have sought" among fellow members.

In France, Moonies house 400 full-time members. It also has an estimated 2,000 associate members.
