Mexican national shot by 'tick-rider' near Rio Grande

United Press International
HIDALGO — Authorities Wednesday investigated the reported accidental shooting of a Mexican national by a member of the Agriculture Department's "tick-riders" — a group seeking congressional approval to carry guns.

Ruben Guardiola of Reynosa, Mexico, was shot in the head in the Tuesday afternoon incident. "It's our understanding it was accidental," said Raymond Smith, U.S. Agriculture Department Veterinary Services district supervisor.

Smith said three tick-riders — Agriculture Department inspectors who patrol the Texas-Mexico border to assure animals are not smuggled into the United States before being checked for illness — were investigating a report that a man planned to smuggle a horse across the Rio Grande about two miles south of the Hidalgo International Bridge.

The officers saw a man walking toward the river and asked him to halt but he continued walking, Smith said.

"They were in thick brush and he was coming toward me," Smith said. "The spurs on the brush and he tripped and fell backward, and the gun went off."

Smith said the name of the inspector was being withheld pending a review of the shooting.

Hidalgo County Sheriff's deputies also were investigating the shooting.

Smith said the tick-riders sought approval from Congress to carry guns because of the long border and because they believed permission had been granted to carry weapons June 1.

"I don't really know what status is," he said. "There's an earlier report that it was supposed to be in effect. I haven't gotten any instructions yet from our own department. Some have been carrying for a while."

However, the bill given approval to carry guns is currently lodged in the Senate. The House received House approval.

Machine measures night jaw activity

United Press International
SAN ANTONIO — Sleep researchers have known for years that tossing and turning during the night can affect the way one feels the next morning, but little attention was given to how much one clenches one's teeth while sleeping.

Some researchers believe many jaw joint or jaw muscle problems are related to how much one unconsciously contracts his jaw muscles during sleep.

Researchers at the University of Texas Health Science Center at San Antonio recently devised a machine that measures the jaw activity during sleeping hours. The process is designed to improve diagnosis and treatment of jaw joint problems that affect an estimated 10 million Americans.

It consists of attaching three tiny wires to the upper jaw to measure the muscle activity and feed the information to a small machine placed on the pillow. The following morning, the small portable muscle activity monitor, which looks like a handheld calculator, is taken to a dentist, who determines how much the teeth contracted during the night.

The machine was developed by Dr. John Rugh, associate professor of restorative dentistry and Chuck Bugar, a biomedical engineer and second-year medical student. When the play button is pressed, the monitor shows a reading of ongoing muscle contraction.

"Most of the problems from using the jaw muscles much. One type of overuse from psychological stress is form of teeth clenching," Dr. M. Franklin D.D.M.D., an associate professor of oral and maxillofacial surgery at the health science center.

Some symptoms of jaw disorders include pain and stress over the jaws in front of the ear, pain when moving the jaw while chewing, jaw joints such as clicking or grinding difficulty in opening or closing the jaw. Some people also experience pain and ringing sounds in the ear, accompanied by headaches.

Once a jaw joint problem is diagnosed, treatment may include medication, relaxation therapy, teeth adjustment surgery.
