Guide to help 'Everywoman'

United Press International
This month, for the third straight year, more women than men will sign up for college.

The statistical tilt to women, first noted by the National Center for Education Statistics in 1980, roughly figures out to 6.2 million women vs. 5.8 million men. If you prefer percentages, it works out 51.4 percent females; 48.6 percent, males.

One reason for the shift: more women than men in the 30-to-35 age bracket are going for a first-time degree, or returning to finish up one, or to earn new training as they try for a new career.

"Are today's colleges and universities meeting the needs of today's woman?" asks Dr. Florence Howe, feminist and scholar, who is professor of humanities at State University of New York, College of Old Westbury, and director of research and publishing at The Feminist Press.

She and others asked the question repeatedly during a conference at Wellesley College's Center some two years ago, Howe recalled.

The result: a book was born. Called "Everywoman's Guide to Colleges and Universities," it was funded by the Fund for the Improvement of Post-Secondary Education and the Carnegie Corporation.

Howe said the guide rates colleges in three categories:

1. Women in leadership positions in student body, faculty, administrators.
2. Women and the curriculum.
3. Women and athletics.

The big paperback — "the size of a big city telephone book" — is dedicated to Title IX "on its tenth birthday," Dr. Howe said. Title IX, a Federal law passed by Congress in 1972, says:

"No person shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving federal financial assistance."

Among other things, it gives female students and workers on campus equity with males.

"Everywoman's Guide," Howe said, "profiles nearly 600 institutions — public, private, doctorate-granting, four-year and two-year — in state-by-state order."

"It provides the facts about the status of women and specific services for women on campus — a subject that is rarely discussed but a reality that female students must confront from the first day."

Nuts and bolts information between covers of the guide came from an 11-page questionnaire sent schools and drawn up with help from the publishing project's sponsoring organizations and advisory board.

More than the enrollment shift to more females than males was involved in the start-up of the guide. Howe said there was concern because records showed 47.5 percent of female students transfer after their sophomore year. That is based on a study done by the National Center on Education Statistics. Twenty-seven percent go from two- to four-year schools. Another two-year school rest are in four-year schools also, supposedly, are their needs.

"Everywoman's Guide" sponsors hope, will be on their academic choices that fit their family, career and needs in a more manner.

Howe said the questions involved these choices provided for the book and for college.

"They are, like many to questions raised periods of social change," she said. "But the full enough to act on

Couple maps nude beaches

United Press International
PARIS — Now there's an official guide to French beaches where tourists and locals can leave their inhibitions — and bathing suits — at home.

This year's Official Nudist Guide to the Seashore, available in French at newspaper stands and book stores across the country for $6, provides detailed maps of more than 200 beaches where nudity is usual, plus helpful hints for the topless or bottomless sunbather.

"My husband and I actually tried out all the beaches listed in the guide," author Francine Nenon, 40, said. "I love nudism and I love the ocean."

"I visited local police stations and, depending on how conservative the officers seemed, I introduced myself either as a writer or simply as a vacationer looking for a place to practice nudism."

France was slower than some other European countries to accept nude sunbathing, which began creeping along its three coastlines in the early 1970s. As recently as 1980, police in Nice launched a drive to halt what they called a "nudist invasion" of Mediterranean beaches.

National police, using aerial photographs of French beaches, counted 800,000 "naturists" in 1979. The French Federation of Naturism said the figure was up to 1 million in 1982.

"We get lots of German, Dutch, British, Belgian, Swiss and American summer vacationers on our nude beaches," FFF spokeswoman Ghislaine Pesnel said.

The FFF, a non-profit organization founded in 1934 to regulate private nudist colonies, has a campaign three years to open more public nudist beaches.

After getting approval from local mayors and town councils, the federation puts up the beach, allotting 50 naturists.

"Sometimes the lack of drawing too much naturism," Mrs. Nenon

Americans invade kitchens of Paris

United Press International
PARIS — The busy kitchen in the Paris restaurant hummed with the artistry of the chef and five assistants, chopping and peeling, stirring and whipping. As one kitchen boy sped into the room-sized refrigerator with a crate of lettuce and another scooped egg whites into a dessert, out rang an accent straight from Minnesota.

"What kind of vinegar is he putting in the mousse?" Marilyn Ames of Saint Cloud, Minn., asked.

Foreigners eager to learn French cooking are flooding Paris's seven cooking schools.

Others work in restaurant kitchens, glad to be assigned to chopping onions. Once they know the tricks, some stay on to get a piece of the food action themselves.

American graduates of French cooking schools have begun teaching French fellow Americans, whom feel more comfortable learning from them. Others teach American or operate catering services.

Robert Noah, 33, of Mo., was responsible for Marilyn Ames and other Americans kibbitzing in the elegant Morot restaurant.

Through word-of-mouth a temporary tie-in with the Northern Illinois University, Noah steers students to observe and sometimes work in Paris restaurant kitchens. During three hours Morot Gaudry kitchen Americans did some with help from the chef gets a cut of Noah's profits. "The idea is to get real working kitchens what's involved," said
