Golf teams set goals high for this season

by Bill Robinson

Winning a state or conference championship in a major collegiate sport is unquestionably beneficial to the image of a university.

And while times might be rough for some Aggie sports and the championships few and far between, the Texas A&M golf teams have provided the University with considerable publicity.

Both the men's and women's teams won their divisions last year and will begin defense of those titles Monday — the men in Fort Smith, Ark., and the women in Oklahoma City, Okla.

Although the going won't be easy for either team, both coaches are looking forward to the fall season, primarily because of a large number of returning starters.

All five starters return from the men's team, which finished the 1982 season as the NCAA's No. 4 team. The women, who finished fifth at the NCAA tournament, return four starters.

Two players should prove to be advantageous to the teams — one is the Southwest Conference men's medalist and the other is the Texas Association for Intercollegiate Athletics for Women medalist.

All-America Danny Briggs, who led the men to the SWC crown during the 1982 season, returns for his senior season, while TAIAW medalist Shirley Furlong will lead her team into its first season as a part of the NCAA.

While the jump into NCAA action is a big one for the women, that organization's action is getting to be old hat for the men. And that is a good reason for cautious optimism.

"We have everyone coming back and I feel good about but the teams we will be are essentially the same men's coach Bob Ellis said.

Among those teams are experienced squads of University of Houston, University of Texas, and University of Texas at A&M.

"Houston and Texas their better players but TCU and Arkansas are some good recruiting schools," said. "I'd like to say we to be out there defend conference (title) but going to be easy. We have work ahead of us."

Briggs, coming off a mer schedule which included tournaments in just 12 had an even more optimistic attitude about the team. "We're going to have a See GOLF page
