Male stripper apprehended

United Press International
WILMINGTON, Del. — A man who went to women's homes and danced in his bikini underwear was arrested for impersonating a professional stripper.

Michael Miller, 23, of Wilmington, allegedly found the women's names in a telephone book and claimed to represent a company called Balloons Inc., state police Sgt. Joe Forester said.

Miller then appeared at the women's homes and stripped down to his underwear, Forester said.

The man was arrested when he returned to a woman's home for an encore, the state trooper said.

Miller was charged with three counts of criminal impersonation and one count of possession of cocaine.

He was released Wednesday on $2,000 bond, Forester said.

Laser technique melts clots

United Press International
DAVIS, Calif. — A new, non-surgical technique inspired by the movie "Star Wars" uses lasers to melt arterial blockages and could one day replace painful coronary bypass operations for many heart patients.

Dr. Garrett Lee, a cardiologist at the University of California at Davis, said Wednesday his procedure, still in the animal experiment stage, involves threading a slender tube through a patient's artery to the point of obstruction.

One optic fiber within the catheter sheds light on the interior and another is hooked up to television, enabling physicians to see inside the vessel. A solid quartz fiber carries the laser beam, and a small inflatable balloon attached to the catheter blocks the flow of blood.

"We can position the catheter up and down, and whatever we see we can zap," Lee said. Fatty deposits on the walls melt away. Smoke and debris are sucked out of the artery in a process still under development.

Medical researchers estimate that more than 4 million Americans suffer from coronary heart disease and that $2 billion was spent in the United States last year on approximately 110,000 bypass surgeries. These involve splicing a section of artery around clogged vessels. Lee, who says his method may make many bypass operations unnecessary, began developing the laser technique after watching Obi-Wan Kenobi in the movie "Star Wars."

"When I saw 'Star Wars' and a laser sword, I said, 'Why can't we deliver this thing in the heart, or any blood vessel for that matter?' So we started experimenting with specimens of blocked coronary arteries taken from people who died of heart disease," he said.

Last month, Lee began a second phase of tests with live pigs fattened on a high cholesterol diet. He is one to two years away from testing the laser procedure in humans and, if all goes well, its use could be widespread by the end of the decade.

Lasers, which concentrate intense beams of light, are widely used in the medical world to burn away cancerous tumors, control bleeding during surgery and fuse retinas to the back wall of the eye.

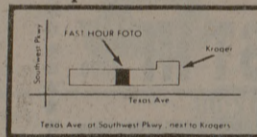

Marvin Loeb, of Trimedynce Inc., which has licensed the laser catheter from the university, estimates the cost of experiments thus far at $500,000, with the tab for the entire project likely to range from $2 million to $3 million.
