SMU students protest alleged discrimination

United Press International DALLAS — A group of male students of Southern Methodist University has formed an organization to end the special programs for minority students which the group says amount to reverse discrimination.

The student senate last week voted 32-4 to accept the Association for White Students as an official organization eligible to use university facilities and receive funding.

The 25-member all-male group, which has applied for $1,045 in operating expenses, has no written charter, but its goal is to "promote equality by ending reverse discrimination," said association president James T. Robison.

SMU, where minorities comprise 4 percent of the student body, has no minority recruitment program, but one is under way. The university does not award scholarships on the basis of race.

Robison, 21, an engineering major, said his first objective is to abolish a policy that allows four groups of minority students — Mexican-Americans, blacks, foreigners and women to elect their own senators.

"Minorities on this campus are over-represented," Robison said. "Why should Mexican-Americans have more voting power than white males?"

Robison cited women's golf as an example of special treatment for women, since the school has no men's golf team.

SMU president L. Donald Shields, who is approved to deny university approval to any student organization, said Tuesday he opposes the goals of the new group, but is reluctant to reverse a decision made by the student senate.

Clarence Glover, SMU's director of black student services, said the new group is an affront to minorities and efforts to improve race relations on campus.
