United Press International
NEW YORK — Women have always been accused of talking too much, but at least one group of women doesn't talk enough, says an expert in teaching speaking skills to managers.

"Fear of speaking in public and an aversion to technology are two important reasons that surprisingly few middle management women make it to senior management ranks," says Virgil Scudder. Scudder is president of MediaCom, a New York firm that has trained more than 5,000 executives.

"Studies show that women at all levels in business and the community tend to be more afraid of public speaking than men," Scudder says. "Particularly in critical areas such as job interviews and salary negotiations, many women tend to underplay their role."

Scudder has developed a program designed to help women executives overcome their fear of public speaking. It uses an advanced video playback system to record and playback their performances behind the podium, in conference rooms and at informal one-on-one interviews.
