United Press International
NEW YORK — A psychology professor says men and women tend to repeat their parents' mistakes in marriage, even though they vow to do things differently.

In the November issue of Glamour magazine, James L. Framo of Temple University says most people unconsciously use their parents as role models when they marry.

"People have a tremendous fear they won't know what to do in new situations," a New York psychotherapist says in the same article.

"Rules make things simple," adds Leah Cahan Schaefer. "You know what you're supposed to do. When it comes to such issues as marriage and family, we usually do what we think comes naturally."
