Fast injections may save lives

United Press International BOSTON—Quick intravenous injection of an enzyme that helps dissolve blood clots can save lives in 25 percent of heart-attack cases and may keep the survivors alive longer, medical researchers said Thursday.

A review of a decade of studies around the world showed that feeding the enzyme streptokinase into a vein with a needle is safer and simpler than the increasingly common practice of feeding the drug through a catheter (a tiny plastic tube) directly to the clot, the doctors reported in the New England Journal of Medicine.

Heart attacks, which strike hundreds of thousands of Americans annually, are usually the result of a blood clot stuck in a narrowed artery, interrupting flow of blood to the heart. Death can result if the heart muscle is deprived of blood for too long.

Streptokinase starts a process that dissolves clots in the coronary artery, thereby restoring the muscle's blood supply.

Streptokinase treatment improved long-term survival rates for heart-attack victims as well as cutting initial mortality rate 20 to 25 percent, the study said.

It is most effective when given early, said a member of the research team, Dr. Samuel Z. Goldhaber of Harvard Medical School.

When administered 72 hours after the patient suffered heart-attack symptoms, the enzyme's ability to keep the patient alive was considerably reduced, the studies showed.

The doctors warned, however, that the enzyme increased local bleeding.

The review was prompted because of a growing tendency among doctors in favor of intracoronary infusion, in which the enzyme is administered directly into a coronary artery by a catheter, Goldhaber said.

"Intravenous infusion of streptokinase is less invasive, less expensive and easier than intracoronary infusion, and its effects have already been studied in random trials," the doctors reported.
