

Hyper Cheap Trick heats Rollie crowd on cold night

by Gary Barker

Guess what? Cheap Trick was hyper. Guess what? Cheap Trick was really hyper. And it was contagious.

It may have been cold outside Thursday night, but inside G. Rollie White Coliseum there wasn't a dry underarm. Cheap Trick — that zany, pubescent-looking, power pop group from the Midwest — took a packed house, partially excited from an adequate warm-up band, and kept them on their feet for a solid hour and a half.

The warm-up band for the show was Novo Combo, an average high-tech band mainly composed of ex-session players. Novo Combo was no big deal but they had enough to get the show started. The group had efficient harmonies and no wasted notes, but little stage presence.

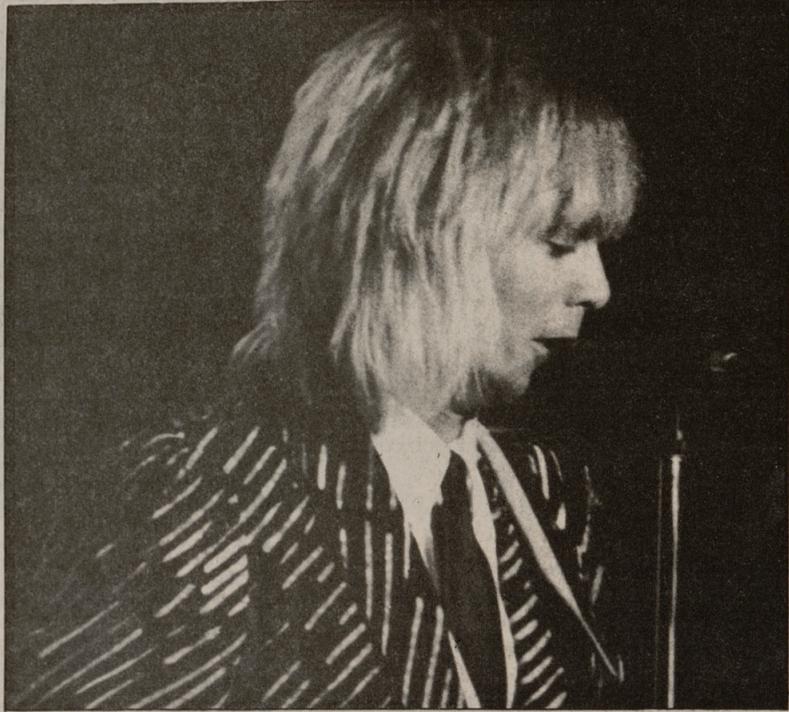

However, Cheap Trick — especially Rick Nielsen, the band's lead guitarist and songwriter — more than compensated for Novo Combo's lack of personality.

With his almost non-existent hair and customary baseball cap, Nielsen hardly looks the part of a rock 'n' roller. But as he careened around the stage, dashing off guitar licks as if they were shorthand, it became obvious that he's an excitable, rambunctious and talented entertainer.

Cheap Trick opened with "Hello There," their traditional call to order and then went straight into "California Man," a rousing song that invited the audience to a party.

And the party was loud, but the group justified the volume. When lead singer Robin Zander's neck muscles strained as he screamed "yeah, yeah, yeah" at the end of the Beatles' "Day Tripper," it was clear that volume and rock 'n' roll are unalterably synonymous.

Zander's voice was well-tuned all evening. He rarely missed a note and his powerful voice filled the coliseum even when he was unaccompanied.

Complementing Zander and Nielsen were Jon Brant, the group's new bass player, and Bun E. Carlos, drummer. Carlos and Brant provided a solid rhythm backing and kept the songs on course even when Nielsen got carried away with his Ted Nugent-like antics. Magic Christian, keyboard player and back-up vocalist, also provided back-up, but he was kept hidden behind a row of speakers.

The group changed up their tunes enough to make them interesting, but kept them close enough to their albums to keep the audience satisfied — and entertained. They were animated and theatrical — Nielsen punctuating his guitar riffs by throwing guitar picks into the audience, Zander grimacing and whispering at appropriate times.

Zander was the ultimate tease, taking advantage of his Tiger Beat idol good looks to captivate the females in the audience. Once, carrying a 12-string acoustic guitar, he came out on stage and played the opening chords to the Kinks' "Lola," only to stop in mid-song and play the group's latest hit, "If You Want My Love."

After a standing ovation, the group came back for two encores and sent the crowd away chanting "we're all alright, we're all alright." And it was alright. Really alright.
