Even trees can be warned

United Press International

SEATTLE — A colony of tent caterpillars feasts on the tender spring leaves of a stand of willow trees.

Within two weeks, the chemistry of the leaves on the trees seems to change, becoming less digestible and noticeably slowing the growth of the voracious insects.

What's more, the leaves on a nearby stand of willows not yet infested by the caterpillars undergo the same change.

What this means to researcher David Rhoades of the University of Washington is that the willows not only possess natural protective mechanisms but also can trigger the same defensive response in nearby uninfested trees.

"We don't know precisely what change in chemistry occurs after a plant has been damaged," he said, "and we don't know how this information is being transmitted. We are inclined to believe it is an airborne substance."

"We also see some of the same effects when clearing an area of trees," he said. "We see chemical changes in nearby trees, indicating the message of a threat to their existence has been transmitted."

He said his research adds to the information developed by a group headed by Clarence Ryan, a biochemist at Washington State University at Pullman, Wash.
