Computers may make lawyers' work harder

United Press International
NEW YORK — The computer is creating headaches and even nightmares for the legal profession.

Although it can make legal research vastly easier, the computer is causing thousands of suits that are a difficult, if profitable, business for lawyers, said Bruce Brickman of the New York firm of Braverman & Rosen.

Many of these suits have criminal angles which may force civil lawyers to practice criminal law, he said.

Law firms could find themselves defendants in computer crime cases or be forced to take action as plaintiffs to protect themselves.

Computer crime, a matter of a few isolated cases a few years back, now is a growing problem. Brickman said there already are at least 3,000 lawsuits pending in the country involving computer crime and computer negligence.

One area of computer fraud which may hurt law firms the most is misrepresentation in contracts by computer equipment makers and marketers, software companies and service organizations.

Brickman said many of these contracts are designed to benefit the seller, not the buyer or computer user and are drafted to keep the seller in complete control.

A law firm is vulnerable itself because of its vast amounts of valuable information that can be stolen or misused criminally.

In addition, Brickman said, many law firms don't realize that a computer system may require a professional operator. That means an attorney no longer will have direct access to his files and is, in effect, hostage to the computer expert.
