Way to lower eggs' cholesterol is found

United Press International
STARKVILLE, Miss. — Mississippi State University researchers have found a way to lower the amount of cholesterol in eggs, though not enough to allow people with high cholesterol to add eggs to their diets.
Researchers found that by adding crude fiber, including wood shavings, to the basic diets of laying hens, egg yolk cholesterol decreased as much as 15 percent.
"We were hoping to get more than a 15 percent reduction," said Dr. James L. McNaughton. "We don't think that is enough. If we had gotten a 40 percent reduction, people with high cholesterol could eat some eggs."
Egg yolk is very high in cholesterol, which is thought to be a contributing factor to heart attacks and strokes.
McNaughton, an animal nutritionist with the U.S. Department of Agriculture, said researchers found the reduction in cholesterol while working on another project.
"Researchers were trying to determine whether sunflower meal could be used in place of some soybean meal in the diets of commercial laying hens, McNaughton said.
"We just decided to check the cholesterol level and found it lower in higher fiber diets," he said. "Then we got into checking other fiber sources. We checked the cholesterol on the ongoing project and found we could lower the amount. Then we started working with other tests to determine how much."
Researchers found by feeding dietary fibers, egg yolk cholesterol could be reduced by about 8.8 percent. But it decreased about 15 percent when crude dietary fiber was fed to hens as compared to a corn-soybean meal base diet containing crude fiber.
"Egg yolk cholesterol was significantly decreased by feeding alfalfa meal, oats, sunflower meal, rice mill feed, or wood shavings to laying hens when compared to yolk cholesterol of hens fed the base diet," said researchers.
McNaughton indicated researchers are not positive why fiber reduces cholesterol.
He said it is possible to reduce egg cholesterol by the use of drugs.
"But drugs are found in the egg itself, which is undesirable," he said. "We can experimentally reduce cholesterol by steroids, but it is undesirable at this point. "We are trying to do it from a natural standpoint."
