Wildlife assortment housed at library

by David Hatch

Battalion Reporter
The Texas Cooperative Wildlife Collection, composed of more than 300,000 preserved fish, reptile, amphibian, mammal and bird specimens, has a new home in the Sterling C. Evans Library.

The new facility brings the collection together for the first time in over 30 years. The specimens were stored in separate rooms of Nagle Hall.

"This new facility doubles our floor and shelving space," said Dr. Keith Arnold, professor of wildlife science and one of the curators of the collection. "It also provides us with optimum environmental conditions as the air conditioning system is able to keep the humidity very low and there are no windows so sunlight cannot fade any specimens."

"We have been working on getting a new facility for about two years. We thought for a time that we would be getting the butcher shop in the animal industries building, but that was delegated to another department and we were given the new facility."

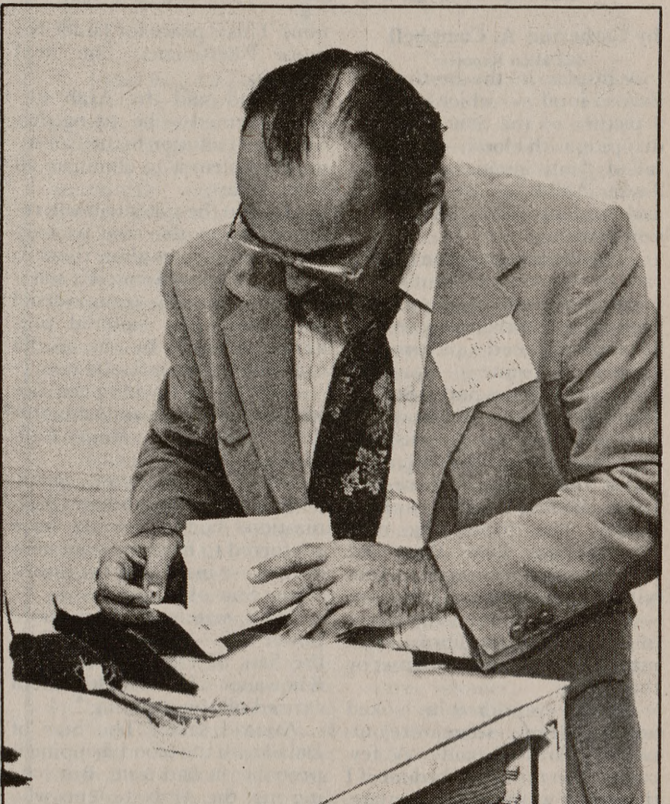

The collection, now in 107B Evans Library, is accessible only by the outdoor metal stairway on the north side of the building.

"The collection will be open primarily to students and researchers," Arnold said. "It is not a museum. It is intended to serve as a research tool, providing data for the faunal history of Texas, the United States and those parts of the world where A&M students and staff are conducting research. It is not intended for the general public's use."

"People off the street would not do much damage to a specimen in a bottle, but could severely damage skin samples of mammals and birds because they don't know how to properly handle them."

The specimens and data contained in the collection are a valuable research tool, Arnold said, and the research results often have unplanned benefits.

"A scientist can never tell what future use his collection may find," Arnold said. "Egg samples collected early in the century were used to determine how extensive the egg shell damage was to species that were exposed to pesticides over many years. The data that was gathered during this experiment was used by environmentalists to enact legislation banning some pesticides and controlling the use of most others."

The wildlife and fisheries department is responsible for the maintenance and operation of the collection. Four curators have been designated to manage different sections: Dr. James Dixon, curator of amphibians and reptiles; Dr. David Schmidly, curator of mammals; Dr. Keith Arnold, curator of birds; and Dr. John McEachran, curator of fish.

"Mainly, we have specimens from Texas and Mexico," Arnold said. "But we have samples from all over the world, too. There are 200 birds from China that were collected by a former student of A&M while he was serving in a military capacity with the Chinese during the second world war. But most of our samples have been gathered by people just doing research in the field."

The collections are thoroughly indexed, he said, so that samples can be found quickly.

Arnold also said the collection curators are preparing a grant proposal to submit to the National Science Foundation. If the proposal is accepted, the foundation would provide significant support to the collection over the next few years.

The proposal includes a request for the financing of the computerization of the data associated with the specimens.

"This will speed the information retrieval service, especially the requests for just pure data that we often receive from other institutions," Arnold said.
