class where they learn LOGO, a computer language designed for children.

Randy Caperton, who teaches math to advanced students at Bowie Elementary School, said he is enthusiastic about having a computer in his classroom.

"I think they're great," he said. "The computer can teach the student everything he needs to know about a particular math skill, and then I can supplement what he has learned with additional exercises."

The Apple computer saves a lot of teaching time and lowers the student-teacher ratio, Caperton said.

"One benefit of having the computers is that at the end of the year I can go back and look at all of the students' work to check their progress," he said.

also have access to Apple Pilot, a program that enables them to develop their own disks.

College Station also offers summer classes for all students, teachers and local residents who want to learn programming.

Kay Dobbs, computer aide for special education students in College Station, said computers have been helpful in special education classes.

"The teachers are very enthusiastic about the Apple (computers), and the kids love them," she said. "The computers use positive reinforcement with the students. If they do something right, the computer says 'Good Job.' And if they do it wrong, it asks 'Would you like to try again?'"

The special education students work with the computers 30 minutes a day, even on week, on many subjects.
