Economic news optimistic but leaders still cautious

United Press International WASHINGTON — The latest advance in the government's leading economic indicators has given administration officials a new chance to demonstrate how confidence in a pending recovery is being tempered by caution.

The 1.5 percent increase in the composite index for December was announced Friday as the biggest jump since September 1980, and was based on a broader economic improvement than the stock-market surges that supported some previous reports.

Although wanting to declare the recession actually has ended, administration spokesmen are holding back, waiting for proof that will not evaporate. The leading indicators report, strong as it was, was not definite enough.

The president's chief economic adviser, Martin Feldstein, told reporters at the White House the report reinforced his "cautious optimism" but said, "I don't know when the recovery is going to begin," perhaps not until March.

President Reagan, whose enthusiasm for his economic program rarely has wavered, hailed the report in advance as "good news" despite setbacks that plagued the first half of his term.

Investors took the stock market up slightly Friday in a volatile session that began on a note of hope for recovery, then lost strength amid fears that the banking industry could face problems from a potential utility bond default.

Dow Jones industrials went up 1.1 points by the close Friday for a gain of 11.77 for the week.

Reports that the Washington Public Power Supply System might default on $2.5 billion worth of bonds for two abandoned nuclear plants stunned traders.

Feldstein, credited with a sober view of the economy's future which he injected in the 1984 budget and the 1983 economic report being delivered to Congress next week, said simply, "A recovery is more likely to begin than we thought a month ago."

The composite index of leading indicators has fallen short of a reliable bellwether of change by going up eight times in nine months, a period when some months when the economy actually worsened.

"Although the leading indicators have gone badly throughout this recession, factors now suggest we are near the end of the downturn," said Gordon Richardson, director of economic analysis for the National Association of Manufacturers.

Sen. Robert Dole, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, agreed.

"The signs of recovery are coming stronger each week," said.

Six of the 10 individual indicators were up in December by a surge in orders for machinery and other equipment.

Proposal could hurt poor

Dumps may be auctioned

United Press International WASHINGTON — Economically depressed regions could end up with some of the nation's high-level radioactive waste sites because they have less political power to resist federal policy, a government-funded study warns.

The report was done under an Energy Department contract by Battelle Memorial Institute, a scientific "think tank." It was written for Battelle by researchers at the University of Arkansas.

The study is one of a series of "topical papers" prepared for the department's Office of Nuclear Waste Isolation, which must plan the creation of repositories to bury dangerous nuclear waste that has been accumulating since World War II.

Energy Department officials emphasize the report only presents options and does not reflect the policy of the agency or Battelle.

But an environmental group that obtained a copy of the study was incensed by the paper.

Dr. Fred Millar, a sociologist with the Environmental Policy Center, objected to a portion that sets out a possible "decision-making scenario" in which the federal government could try to auction off the waste sites to areas that meet the geological requirements.

Millar called the suggestion "shocking," adding, "In a very blunt way, it says poor communities may have to swallow this thing."

Under the scenario, the department would offer regions some form of financial compensation as an inducement to "purchase acceptance," the study said.

"Perhaps one of the most severe criticisms of the auctioning process is ethical," the report stated. "The argument is that poor communities will be more likely to bid than affluent communities and that, consequently, the auctioning process will result in these communities accepting risks and negative effects they should not have to accept."

Proposal could hurt poor

The study notes that without an auctioning process "Low-income communities more likely to be selected for the repository is a serious disamenity, since they do not have the power to resist whereas affluent communities do."

Millar said, "It bothers me that the report suggests the government might take advantage of a situation where poor communities, desperate for financial resources, might bid against each other for radioactive sites."

Energy Department officials note the study also suggests affluent communities may bid for waste sites, no matter how much encouragement they are given.
