Nation's lawyers reject changes in ethics code

United Press International NEW ORLEANS — The nation's largest lawyer's group is sticking with its ethics code which limits when an attorney must reveal a client's secrets to protect the public.

The American Bar Association's policy-making body Monday rejected changes in the lawyer's ethics code that would have expanded the circumstances under which attorneys could break client confidences.

Delegates were urged to require lawyers to disclose client secrets to prevent fraud, serious financial harm or imminent physical danger. The current lawyer's ethics code, adopted in 1969, asks lawyers only to disclose confidences to prevent a crime. The only other exception to the client secrecy rule is when a lawyer is disputing fees with a client.

Under the proposal, which died on a 207-129 vote, a lawyer would have been called on to violate the traditional lawyer-client privilege in cases when he reasonably believed there would be substantial injury to the financial interests of another or to rectify the consequences of a client's criminal or fraudulent act.

The privilege permits a lawyer to keep silent on any communications from a client while legally representing him. The action during the ABA's mid-winter meeting leaves intact existing ethical rules, which bar a lawyer from disclosing client secrets in virtually all circumstances.

Under the standards of the profession, however, lawyers may reveal confidences in a fee dispute or to protect individuals from death or imminent bodily harm.

Opponents of the change argued it would turn lawyers into policemen, while supporters said lawyers must be able to step forward to head off crime in order to keep the public's respect.

The vote by the 367-member House of Delegates came three years after the proposed Model Rules of Professional Conduct were brought before the ABA. The ABA rules, used by states as guidelines for disciplinary actions against errant lawyers.

A final, formal vote on model rules will not come at the annual meeting of the 300,000-member ABA this summer. It is unlikely that the House as a whole will decide differently than the House of Delegates.
