Magnets may be used in orthodontics' future

United Press International
Crisscrossed by wires and laced with elastics, the smile of an orthodontic patient bristles with hardware. But soon, common dental braces may be dramatically simplified with an unlikely component: magnets.

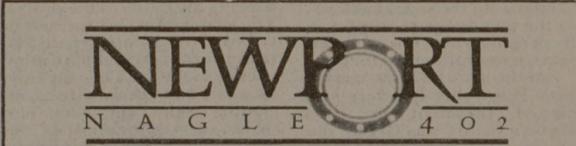

Braces straighten unruly teeth by gently pulling them into line. Additional force is often provided by small rubber bands that link and pull the upper and lower molars toward each other.

"I've never been happy with rubber bands," says orthodontist Abraham Blechman of Columbia University's School of Dental and Oral Surgery. What he proposes is replacing the bands with four small, powerful magnets. Wired to the metal bands, they would steadily pull and align the teeth.

Magnets would work faster than conventional procedures, Blechman told Science Digest. "I have used magnets on four patients. Treatment times have been decreased by as much as 50 percent," he claims.

Another year of research is necessary before the magnets will be widely available.
