Fathers may instill violence

United Press International
WASHINGTON — A 4-year-old held a knife to his mother's throat while she slept, a 12-year-old strangled her sister, a 5-year-old hit his teacher with a rubber bat.

New York University psychiatric researchers studied these and 18 other children with murderous behavior and found the most significant factor that seemed to contribute to their behavior was having a violent father.

Dr. Dorothy Otnow Lewis reported the findings in the February issue of the American Journal of Psychiatry and said most of the disturbed youngsters had come from homes filled with violence.

"Witnessing and being the victim of rage and frustration that, when directed inward, expressed itself as suicidal behavior," she wrote. "When directed outward and displaced from the father, it manifests itself as homicidal aggression."

Dr. Lewis and her associates studied the medical records of 51 children between the ages of 3 and 12 who had been admitted to a child psychiatry service in a midtown hospital during a one-year period.

Twenty-one of the children were judged to have been homicidally aggressive. Nine had attacked siblings, five had attacked mothers, three had attacked teachers and four had attacked other relatives or acquaintances.

None had attacked his father, and only two said they wanted to.

The researchers said the psychiatric symptoms of those children judged to be homicidally aggressive were surprisingly similar to the non-homicidal children.

Almost all of the children in both groups had a mother in the home, but few households had a biological father steadily living at home.

But when the fathers did appear, the report said that they were physically violent to the mothers in 62 percent of the households of homicidal children compared with only 13 percent of the households of non-homicidal children.

"In fact, 37 percent of the fathers of homicidal children themselves had been homicidal as had 13 percent of the fathers of the non-homicidal children," the report said.

Alcoholism also was significantly more common in fathers of homicidally aggressive children.

The researchers found that in contrast to the fathers, 43 percent of the mothers of the group had been in trouble with the law. But 43 percent of the mothers of the homicidal children had a history of psychiatric hospitalization while only 10 percent of the mothers of the non-homicidal children had such a history.
