House leaders face Reagan jobs plan

United Press International
WASHINGTON — President Reagan's top aides hope to reach agreement with House Democratic leaders on how to create several hundred thousand temporary jobs for America's more than 11 million unemployed, sometime this week.

They are working with a $4.3 billion jobs program proposal made by Reagan after weighing political and economic realities.

In a federal budget approaching $800 billion, the $4.3 billion Reagan proposed, may seem insignificant. The proposal could, however, rise as high as $5 billion under pressure for compromise.

But just two months ago, as unemployment was still rising, Reagan was trumpeting his opposition to temporary relief programs promoted by Democrats who had exploited the issue of his "compassion" in the fall campaign.

In his budget message to Congress on Jan. 31, Reagan warned "over-reactive, short-term remedies are not the answer" and urged that trust instead be placed in his longer term quest for economic prosperity.

So there was a touch of irony when, 10 days ago, Reagan sent a team of top advisers to offer Democratic leaders the outlines of a package of temporary recession relief.

For the record, Reagan and his aides insist there is a significant difference between the public works jobs he proposes and those provided in earlier plans he threatened to veto.

While deputy White House press secretary Larry Speakes said the Democrats wanted to put Americans to work doing "leaf-raking chores," earlier proposals, like Reagan's, placed heavy emphasis on construction and other public works projects.

Clearer evidence of Reagan's change of heart is provided by the fact that he proposed a million in additional recession assistance just during the week telling reporters his administration already was doing things that we can in the guard."
