Feds ignore report of dioxin in lakes

United Press International
WASHINGTON—EPA officials urged in a 1981 draft report that fishing in the Great Lakes be banned because of dioxin contamination, but the federal government did little to discourage fishing, agency officials say.

Regional Environmental Protection Agency officials in Chicago recommended in the report in the spring of 1981 that Great Lakes fishing be stopped because the potential cancer risks were too high, sources said.

But scientists at the agency's headquarters — along with former assistant administrator John Todhunter — eliminated the reference, agreeing the decision should be left to the Food and Drug Administration, the sources said.

Agency officials sharply criticized the resulting FDA standard that concludes there is negligible health risk to persons who eat a weekly meal of fish contaminated with dioxin at levels of 25 parts per trillion or less, and minimal risk to those who eat fish once a week at levels under 50 parts per trillion.

EPA scientists projected in 1981 that those people face a cancer risk ranging from 1 in 100 to 1 in 1,000 from ingestion of the chemical, minute amounts of which have caused cancer in laboratory animals.

One official familiar with the assessment termed the projected risks "incredibly high," although acknowledging it was not quite as high as the health threat faced by people exposed to dioxin in parts of Missouri.

The 1981 EPA assessment, a copy of which was obtained by UPI, was prepared by Donald Barnes and Paul Brown, co-chairmen of EPA's Chlorinated Dioxins Working Group.

It noted the FDA "has informally pointed to 100 parts per trillion as a level of concern" — a level that would pose a cancer risk of 1 in 100.

Sanford Miller, director of the FDA's Bureau of Foods, acknowledged the FDA eventually decided dioxin levels of 50 parts per trillion or higher were too dangerous for human consumption — levels still higher than those recommended by EPA scientists.

Miller stressed the federal government has no authority to ban fishing in state waters but said the FDA has banned fish sale in interstate commerce of fish taken from contaminated areas.

He said the FDA has urged governors of Michigan and other states bordering the Great Lakes to ban fishing in areas where dioxin levels of 50 parts per trillion or higher are detected.

Dioxin contamination of the Great Lakes drew attention in 1980, when the Canadian government notified the United States high levels of the toxic chemical were found in herring gull eggs in Lake Huron and Lake Ontario.

Clark's widow: ordeal worth it

United Press International
FEDERAL WAY, Wash. — Barney Clark's widow, preparing to say a final goodbye today to the man she met in the 7th grade, has painful memories of her husband's 112-day struggle with the world's first permanent artificial heart but says the ordeal was worth it.

While doctors and others debate the medical and ethical viability of the Jarvik-7 plastic pump, Una Loy Clark recommends other potential artificial heart recipients follow her husband's example.

"They may have unforeseen problems my husband didn't have, but I would tell them to go for it. I really would," Mrs. Clark told reporters over the weekend.

Clark died at 9:02 p.m. Wednesday at the University of Utah Medical Center in Salt Lake City. He was 62.

Funeral services were scheduled for 2 p.m. Tuesday at the Federal Way Mormon Stake Center, where Barney and Una Loy Clark worshipped.

"I don't think there will be another heart recipient who is as physically ill as my husband was," Mrs. Clark said. "I think this is one of the major things they have found through experimentation."

Dr. Robert Jarvik, inventor of the air-driven polyurethane pump, said the next patient could be implanted within six months, hopefully in a body more healthy than Clark's.

Mrs. Clark, her children and her grandchildren held a news conference Saturday, in part to "tell everyone all over the world how much we appreciate their messages of comfort and messages of love."

Repeal of blue law stimulates shopping

United Press International
BOSTON — The solemnity of Palm Sunday did not slow shoppers who celebrated the end of Massachusetts' 200-year-old Blue Laws by flocking to retail stores that had live music, free candy and balloons for the occasion.

Crowds poured out of churches and into department stores and shopping centers throughout the state, with proprietors enticing shoppers with bands, games, candy, and puppet shows to turn the end of the Puritan tradition into a gala occasion.

"If you're going to church you go in the morning. If you want to shop you go in the afternoon," said Evelyn Hinkley of Gloucester, who attended services before showing up at a suburban mall.

"It shouldn't be a crime for Massachusetts citizens to go shopping on Sundays," state Rep. Timothy Bassett, D-Lynn, who spearheaded the move to repeal the antiquated law, said as he cut the red ribbon.

Bassett predicted the extra day of shopping will generate up to 15,000 new jobs, $44 million in new tax revenues and $1.3 billion in sales.

Under the new law, liquor stores are still not allowed to open, and no beer or wine may be sold at markets.
