Computer fear crippling

by United Press International

HAMDEN, Conn. — Don't call your doctor if you think you've got "compuphobia," a fear of computers. It isn't terminal, but there's a lot of it going around.

Frank Papale treats people at Quinnipiac College, whose president, Richard A. Terry, has committed its 2,300 students, faculty and staff to computer literacy.

Papale helps computer-shy people introducing them to the computer with non-technical games such as tic-tac-toe.

"Forget the business application at the onset, the high-level management orientation. Make it fun. Say all you're going to learn is how to play 'Hangman'. The object is to shake out some of the phobias.

Some community colleges offer non-degree courses in the basics. A number have "hands-on" courses. One is even aimed at school teachers to ease any anxieties they may have so they'll be better able to deal with the subject in the classroom.

"If you choose to sit down in this very harmless, non-intimidating environment, you've got a chance of breaking the ice," he said.

Hesitancy over working with computers will handicap some employees, according to a report from International Resource Development, Inc., an independent consulting firm based in Norwalk.

"A great deal of this 'compuphobia' can be related to math anxiety and to difficulties that individuals encounter in learning foreign languages. There are elements of both in the use of computers," said David Ledecy, an IRD researcher who studied psychology at Harvard.

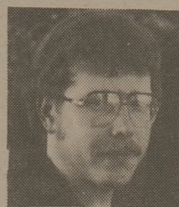

Papale said the appearance today of compuphobia is actually history repeating itself.

"Ten or 15 years ago, employees of companies that could afford computers were going through the same thing," he said. "For years, we dealt with breaking down that resistance.

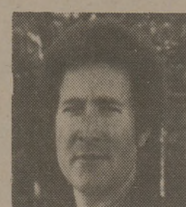

"A lot of people escaped dealing with it because the cost of computers was prohibitive to a lot of companies. But over the past 10 years and more recently with the advent of the micro-computer, computers now are affordable to all companies. So now those people who have been immune or sheltered in the past because the cost was prohibitive don't have that protection any longer," Papale said.
