

Workers' tests show radiation

United Press International
WEBSTER — Preliminary tests have found measurable amounts of contaminants in the bodies of five workers at Gulf Nuclear Inc., according to state health department officials.

They were suspected of being exposed to radiation during an accidental leak of materials at the company.

Richard Ratliff, director of compliance and control for the State Health Department's bureau of radiation control, said Tuesday further tests will be required to determine if the employees received harmful amounts of radiation doses.

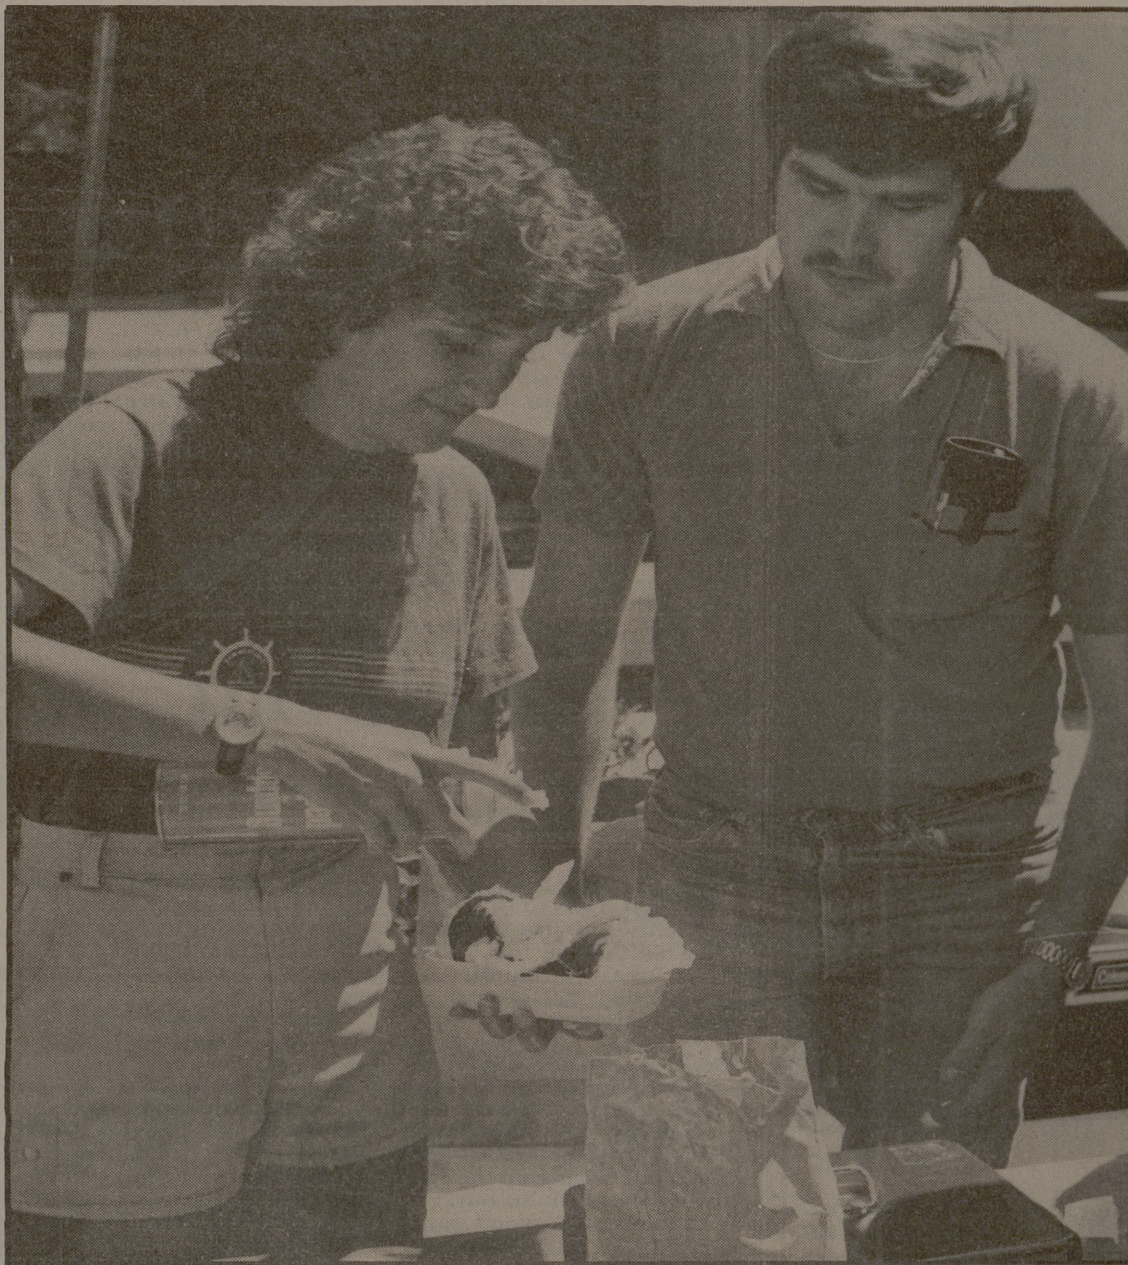

The initial results released came from Oak Ridge National Laboratories in Oak Ridge, Tenn.

Nine employees were exposed to radiation Feb. 8 when a worker accidentally sliced through a capsule containing Americium-241, an isotope used in the petroleum industry.

The company apparently violated the law by failing to report the accident, but employee Ken Kielwein, 26, wrote the state health department about the incident.

The company's operating license was indefinitely suspended March 18 for failing to notify the state, failure to evaluate the situation and the possible exposure to the employees.

That suspension was overruled by a judge in Austin, who said the state health department did not have the authority to order a suspension.

A little more whipped cream

Circle K, an international service organization, tried to raise money for the March of Dimes Wednesday by selling banana splits. One of the members, Dawn Baggott, a junior biology major from Fort Worth, puts the finishing touches on a split with a little help from junior agricultural economics major Reid Jinks. Inset: Freshman Lindy Goodman, a general studies major from Plano, enjoyed the frozen treat at Rudder Fountain.

Ag committee approve pesticide authority bill

United Press International
WASHINGTON — The House Agriculture Committee's approval of a bill extending authority for the government's pesticide programs for one year is only the first step, Rep. Kika de la Garza, D-Texas, reports.

The measure, approved by the committee on a voice vote, next goes to the full House for consideration.

The committee's decision Tuesday overruled a subcommittee that last week went along with appeals by the Reagan administration and chemical industry to extend the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide and Rodenticide Act for two years.

Environmentalists were seeking a one-year extension of the law that governs registration and use of farm and home pesticides.

"I am glad, of course, that we are moving the re-authorization bill along without delay, but I hope everybody interested in this important issue understands that passage is just the first step in what the committee views as a two-phase procedure," de la Garza said.

"The second phase will involve many issues including possible changes in the pesticide law which need to be addressed by our committee. I can assure all concerned that we will begin consideration of those as promptly as possible.

"For the moment, however, it was necessary to move with the critical items of authorization of the Act's Scientific Advisory Panel."

Rep. George Brown, chairman of the subcommittee that approved the bill last week, said the full committee that the Environmental Protection Agency should make improvements in pesticide operations under its legal authority and would the agency to expand its use of pesticide residues and develop formal guidelines making cancer risk assess-
